CONGRESSIONAL RECORD AND APPENDIX,

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

which relates to a matter of election. He has no right to go outside of that which is personal to himself. That is my construction of the rule. He may speak as to that which pertains to him personally, and the House grants him that permission, and no other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that construction of the rule, and the Chair's experience leads him to believe that it is very seldom when five minutes are not enough to enable a member to clear himself from reflections which may have been made upon his representative character, and the Chair will therefore admonish gentlemen who seek to make personal explanations that they must confine themselves literally to the subject-matter of the personal explanation.

Mr. STEVENSON. I make the further point that the gentleman must address the Chair from his seat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should speak from his seat.

[Mr. KITCHIN, who had been speaking in the center aisle, returned to his seat.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish that the gentleman who preceded me had been called to order, so that this discussion would not have taken the range it has. He is a judge in this case. He admits that he has prejudged the case, and he endeavors to sustain himself in doing it. I am not surprised; no, sir. One of the finest English lawers and jurists whose name has gone into history, says that a judge who judges without hearing the evidence and knowing the facts may arrive at a just judgment, but he is himself a wicked and unjust judge. That is what the gentleman has done.

He says that I lack about 2,000 votes of being elected. That charge is untrue. Any one who charges that enough votes were thrown out to give my competitor a majority of 2,000 states that which is utterly untrue, and my colleague must know it, for he resides near enough to the district. He says that votes of whole townships in Lenoir County were thrown out in consequence of a device on the tickets. One precinct was thrown out, and only one, and that by a board of republicans and democrats.

I assert that every vote cast in that county, so far as I could ascertain, for my competitor was counted, except in one precinct, and I have made inquiry of the poll-holders; and in his notice of contest James E. O'Hara only claims one precinct to have been thrown out. There was some throwing out in Edgecombe, but Judge Seymour, a northern man, a native of New York, a capable, honest, and able judge, although a carpet-bagger, (he is a man who has the respect of every gentleman in my district and in my State,) who administers the law impartially and with an even hand, before whom these cases were tried, said that no criminality could be charged against the boards. This judge is a republican of the straitest order, was born a republican, reared an abolitionist. An eminent attorney who appeared for my competitor also said that it was done by his direction and advice.

A majority of the returning board in my county were republicans. I want to ask my friend a question. He has taken occasion to assail me and to reflect upon my people. I want to ask that gentleman if he was not court-martialed and dismissed from the confederate service?

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Do you ask whether I was court-martialed and dismissed from the confederate service?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. How long are you going to give me to answer that question? I was court-martialed and dismissed from the confederate service for whipping a conscript officer, and I was afterward restored to the confederate service by the order of Jeff Davis. [Loud and continued laughter all over the Hall.]

Mr. KITCHIN. One word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has permitted the question to be put and the answer to be made. The Chair now admonishes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that he must confine himself to the personal explanation.

Mr. GIBSON. I make the point of order that this discussion is not in the nature of a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. It is not, and the Chair so rules. The gentleman will confine himself to the personal explanation.

Mr. KITCHIN. Am I not entitled to read from the decision of the supreme court of North Carolina to show the true answer to the question I asked?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!" and "Regular order!"]

Mr. KITCHIN. I will stop.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the Chair hopes it will be observed. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. DAVIDSON. I rise to respond to a remark made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUSSELL.] I desire to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON] asks consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. HAZELTON. I object, unless the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON] has been attacked.

The SPEAKER. There is objection. The Chair has nothing to do with the qualification of the objection.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

Mr. HAZELTON. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. I assure him and I assure the House that I will indulge in no personalities.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. DAVIDSON. Five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to length of time?

Mr. BROWNE. I object.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I say that is not fair. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida has not been recognized to make a personal explanation.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENNA. When a member rises to a personal explanation and confines himself to the rule which has been read, is it not his right to make that explanation?

The SPEAKER. In this controversy the Chair proposes to submit the question to the House, as the Chair thinks those who have spoken thus far have gone beyond rule.

Mr. DAVIDSON. A statement which I made on this floor has been charged as being untrue. I simply ask the privilege of demonstrating to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House that the statement which I made is true and that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUSSELL] has made an untrue statement, whether purposely or not I do not know. If this House will hear me for five minutes I will demonstrate the fact.

Mr. BROWNE. I will withdraw the objection if the gentleman confines himself to five minutes.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I assure the Speaker and the House that I will indulge in no improper personalities of any kind.

It is not pleasure but duty which prompts me to speak at this time. Justice to my absent colleague, [Mr. HULL,] as I said before, justice to the members of the board of State canvassers of Florida, justice to the good people and the fair name of my State prompts me now to raise my voice in this House.

The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUSSELL,] in his speech printed in the RECORD of the 26th of April, stated that it was a well-known fact that two members on this floor, one from Florida and one from North Carolina, held their seats here not by the votes of the people but by the fraudulent mandates of returning boards. In noticing that statement a few days afterward I said that I presumed the words were intended to apply to my colleague [Mr. HULL] who represented the second district, and to the members of the State returning board of Florida. I ask gentlemen of this House if that is not the reasonable construction to be put on the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUSSELL?] But to-day that gentleman says he did not mean to reflect upon the members of the State board of Florida, but upon the county canvassing board.

Now, I am able to demonstrate that the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUSSELL,] as made by him to-day, is not true. Why? Because in the very speech of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] an extract from which the gentleman from North Carolina caused to be read, the gentleman from Maine states that my colleague [Mr. HULL] in his answer admitted that a member of the county board for Brevard County was in the penitentiary properly; and he further stated that the vote from the county of Brevard was counted in making up the returns. I can tell the gentleman from North Carolina that whether fraud was perpetrated or not in Brevard County, we have an honest democratic State returning board in Florida, and that vote was not counted. Therefore, the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina is still false—whether made so purposely or not, I do not pretend to say.

In regard to putting into office thieves and scoundrels in Florida, let me say to the gentleman from North Carolina that when guilt is proven upon an individual there he is punished, under democratic administration. For that reason I suppose there is one member of the county board of Brevard County now in the penitentiary. But, sir, a different rule has prevailed among the republicans in that State. When thieves and scoundrels were found out by them they were put into political position. Go to your Interior Department here, go to the different Departments of the Government in this city, and you will find men holding office who were active and prominent in the perpetration of the great republican frauds of 1876 in the State of Florida.

In the political trial which has recently taken place in Jacksonville before the United States court, in which the county judge of Madison County has been tried, (and Madison was the other county from which the vote was not counted,) the district attorney of the United States, before the case was gone through with, dismissed the proceedings; in other words, he broke down in the case; the testimony would not justify a conviction, therefore he dismissed the proceedings.

Sir, I state again that neither one of the members from the State of Florida on this floor holds his seat by the fraudulent mandates of a returning board. The statement, therefore, made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUSSELL,] I repeat, is untrue.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MILITARY INTERFERENCE AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. KNOTT. I call up House bill No. 1382, to prohibit military interference at elections, and move the bill be put on its passage, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. On that motion I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him, on which he demands the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill? On this question the Constitution requires that the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to prohibit military interference at elections.

Whereas the presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the traditions of our people, and tends to destroy the freedom of elections: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful to bring to, or employ at, any place where a general or special election is being held in a State any part of the Army or Navy of the United States, unless such force be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to enforce section 4, article 4, of the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, upon the application of the Legislature or the executive of the State where such force is to be used; and so much of all laws as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 97, not voting 60; as follows:

So, on reconsideration, the bill was rejected, two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. NICHOLLS, who is absent from the House on account of sickness, if present, would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY, is confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. TALBOTT. My colleague, Mr. HENRY, is paired with Mr. VAN AERNAM, of New York. If present, Mr. HENRY would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WRIGHT. My colleagues, Mr. RYON and Mr. MITCHELL, are paired. If Mr. RYON were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. ATKINS. I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BAKER. If he were present, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. COFFROTH. My colleagues, Mr. BELTZHOOVER and Mr. FISHER, are paired. If Mr. BELTZHOOVER were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CONVERSE. My colleagues, Mr. HILL and Mr. BUTTERWORTH, are paired. This announcement ought to have been made yesterday. If Mr. HILL were here, he would vote in the affirmative on this bill and Mr. BUTTERWORTH would probably vote in the negative. Yesterday on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the Army appropriation bill, if present my colleague, Mr. HILL, would have voted "no" and Mr. BUTTERWORTH would have voted in the opposite direction.

Mr. CLARDY. My colleague, Mr. FROST, is paired with Mr. BINGHAM, of Pennsylvania. If Mr. FROST were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CABELL. My colleague, Mr. HUNTON, is paired with Mr. HISCOCK, of New York. If present, Mr. HUNTON would vote in the affirmative and Mr. HISCOCK probably would vote in the negative. My colleague, Mr. TUCKER, is paired with Mr. LAPHAM, of New York. If Mr. TUCKER were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with Mr. RICHARDSON, of New York. If present, Mr. HULL would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MORSE. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. BOUCK. My colleague, Mr. BRAGG, is paired with Mr. JAMES, of New York. If present, Mr. BRAGG would vote in the affirmative and I presume Mr. JAMES would vote in the negative.

Mr. COBB. My colleague, Mr. COLERICK, is paired with Mr. BALLOU, of Rhode Island. My colleague was called home in answer to a dispatch stating that his mother was in a dying condition. If he were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HENKLE. I believe it has already been announced that my colleague, Mr. HENRY, is paired with Mr. VAN AERNAM, of New York. If Mr. HENRY were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am paired with Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. If he were present, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. KING. My colleague, Mr. ELLIS, is absent on business and is paired with Mr. LORING. If present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague, Mr. SPEER, is paired with Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. HAMMOND, is paired with Mr. VAN VOORHIS, of New York, and my colleague, Mr. NICHOLLS, is paired with Mr. VOORHIS, of New Jersey. I am myself paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I wish to announce that Mr. FORSYTHE is paired with Mr. WALTER A. WOOD, of New York. If present, Mr. FORSYTHE would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. WALTER A. WOOD is paired with Mr. FORSYTHE. If Mr. WOOD were present, he would vote "no."

Mr. ROBINSON. My colleague, Mr. RUSSELL, is paired with Mr. SPEER, of Georgia. If present, Mr. RUSSELL would vote "no" and Mr. SPEER would vote "ay."

Mr. LAPHAM. On all political questions I am paired with Mr. TUCKER. If he were present, I would vote in the negative. My colleague, Mr. VAN AERNAM, is paired with Mr. HENRY on all political questions, and my colleague, Mr. RICHARDSON, is paired with Mr. HULL, of Florida.

Mr. EINSTEIN. Mr. O'REILLY is paired with Mr. PIERCE, and Mr. O'BRIEN with Mr. DWIGHT. If present, Mr. O'REILLY and Mr. O'BRIEN would vote "ay" and Mr. PIERCE and Mr. DWIGHT would vote "no."

Mr. BURROWS. I have been requested to announce that Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana, is paired with Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio.

Mr. ORTH. My colleague, Mr. BAKER, is paired with Mr. ATKINS. If present, Mr. BAKER would vote in the negative.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. RYON. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. My colleagues, Mr. HARMER and Mr. WISE, are paired. If present, Mr. HARMER would vote "no" and Mr. WISE, I presume, would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. DICK. I am paired with Mr. LAY, of Missouri. If he were present, he would vote in the affirmative and I would vote in the negative.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am paired with Mr. FROST, of Missouri. If he were present, I would vote "no."

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the message of the President accompanying the bill which has just been rejected be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and if that motion is debatable I shall demand the previous question.

There was no objection, and the message was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONVERSE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1343) to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 286) to amend sections 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the Navy;

An act (H. R. No. 67) providing for a new propeller for the United States ship Alarm; and

An act (H. R. No. 1376) making appropriations for constructing jetties and other works at South Pass, Mississippi River.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I find that according to the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, in the heat of debate upon the question in regard to correcting the RECORD, I used this expression:

> The fault is with the gentleman who offered the paper in attempting to palm off upon the House a petition which he knew would be distasteful and disrespectful to the House. The fault is with him and no one else.

At the time I made use of that expression I only judged of the paper by its character as described, for I had not read it. After I had read it, I could well see how the gentleman from Iowa in good faith could have offered it. And having occupied the chair at the time as Speaker pro tempore, I know that he did use the proper mode of bringing it before the House. I have been here for ten years and have not in all that time reflected upon the motives of any member, nor has any gentleman reflected on mine. It is from this reflecting on the motives of each other that much of the trouble here arises. And when I find I have made a statement which does a gentleman injustice I feel that it does me as much injustice as it does him. I therefore ask to have stricken from the RECORD that one sentence.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GREAT KANAWHA AND KENTUCKY RIVERS.

Mr. KENNA. I ask unanimous consent to report at this time from the Committee on Commerce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879.

I will state that the last act making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors omitted, in consequence of an oversight of the engineers, to make any provision for the purchase of sites necessary in executing the improvements of the Kentucky River and the Great Kanawha River. The engineering department now recommends that such part of the appropriation as is necessary for that purpose should be expended in that way. When the necessity of an appropriation for the sites is understood at the time, a provision is always made to that effect in the bill. The necessity was not understood on this occasion, and hence the provision was not included in the last bill. This bill is reported in pursuance of the recommendation of the Engineer department. It appropriates no money, and the committee is unanimous in asking that it pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce the bill whose object he has indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKS. I object.

VOTES ON THE INCOME TAX AND ARMY APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise as a matter of privilege, not of personal explanation, to ask for a correct statement of the votes of yesterday on the income tax and Army appropriation bills. I should like to know how the vote now stands on those two measures.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest that those two votes be reprinted in to-morrow's RECORD. I do not think it is a good thing to permit votes to be subsequently recorded; but as in this case so many additions have been made to the lists, I think we might consent to have the lists reprinted with all the new votes upon them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will recollect the Chair has always said that to record a vote after the result has been announced can only be done by the vacation of a rule by unanimous consent, which rule the Chair thinks a proper one.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think the Chair is at all in fault in this matter. It is our own fault.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio suggests that the votes of yesterday on the income-tax and Army appropriation bills shall again appear in the RECORD of to-morrow as they now stand. Is there objection?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I object.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman objects, I think I have a right as a question of privilege to ask for the present standing of the votes.

The SPEAKER. That should be the gentleman's privilege. The vote on the income-tax bill as announced yesterday was 104 in the affirmative and 94 in the negative. Subsequently some gentlemen who came in obtained permission to vote, and the same privilege has been extended to other gentlemen to-day. The vote now stands thus—yeas 111, nays 94. On the question of the passage of the Army appropriation bill under a suspension of the rules the vote as now recorded is 97 in the affirmative and 112 in the negative.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that cannot be. The announced vote yesterday was 101 to 109.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] withdrew his vote. The Chair has given the numbers handed to him by the clerks. This proceeding serves to show the confusion which is created by permission being given to vote after the result has been announced.

Mr. HAWLEY. As it takes some time to make the correction, I renew the request of the gentleman from Ohio that the entire roll-calls on the two bills be repeated in the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I withdraw the objection.

There was no further objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ERRETT. I ask unanimous consent to record my vote on the income-tax bill. I desire to have it recorded in the negative.

Mr. PHISTER. I object.

The following is the corrected vote on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill to restore the income tax:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ACKLEN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the business of the morning hour.

Mr. WARNER. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. Can the gentleman make a motion which is equivalent to a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. He can for the purpose stated; but it requires a two-thirds vote under a rule of the House recently adopted to carry the motion.

Mr. ACKLEN. I hope the motion will be voted down.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 87, noes 55.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the motion was not agreed to.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes past two o'clock. The unfinished business is the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with amendments.

Mr. KNOTT. Was not there a motion made to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No such motion was ever made upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unadvised, as the present occupant of the chair was absent at end of the morning hour on Saturday.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am certain that no such motion was made or is in order on this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I announced that I reserved all points of order upon the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Immediately upon the bill being reported it was ordered to be printed with the amendment, and the Speaker pro tempore then announced that I would be entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair is informed that the motion was submitted to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Chair is also advised that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] reserved all points of order, and in that case now is the time for him to make the points of order he desires to make.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. A point of order of the same nature was made upon the bill reported from the same committee by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LOWE,] and the Speaker held that the bill having been referred by the act of the House to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, the question of referring it to another committee could not arise until the motion for the previous question had been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not decide in manner as stated; the Chair decided that it was too late to raise a point of order after the reference and reporting back a bill from a committee, because the House had an opportunity to pass upon the reference of the bill and referred it.

Mr. CONGER. But if it was improperly referred?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have not made the motion for the previous question, and I still hold the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] reserved points of order, but he has not stated them, so that the Chair is not able to rule upon them.

Mr. CONGER. I reserved all points of order upon the bill when it was reported; after, it was announced by the then occupant of the chair that there was some other order of business and the matter passed over.

The SPEAKER. It appears in the RECORD that the gentleman reserved all points of order upon the bill.

Mr. CONGER. That is the statement I made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then asks the gentleman to state what his point of order is, because if debate is entered upon it will be too late to make a point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I have not had time to examine the bill, but one point which I make is, that the bill was never referred to the committee. The subject-matter of this bill in the last Congress was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and was considered by that committee to some extent, I cannot say to what extent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised differently; he is informed that this bill was reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws by the gentleman from Illinois, and ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to suggest that this subject was considered at the last session of the last Congress by the Committee on the Judiciary, and that the report upon it was made to the House by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. CULBERSON.]

Mr. CONGER. My point of order is that the House has never referred this bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of fact.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I can settle that question of fact now. This bill was introduced by myself in the last Congress, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It did not report the bill back to the House at the beginning of this session. I introduced the same bill and had it referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and that committee ordered it to be reported with amendments, and placed it in my charge. Last Saturday I reported the bill, and announced I should in time put it on its passage. A like question of order, whether the bill was properly referred or not, was passed on by the Chair upon the bill reported by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LOWE.] The Speaker decided, and I have the record now before me, that the point of order upon the reference could not now be raised.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair adheres to that ruling.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then that disposes of the point of order raised by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the Chair cause to be read Rule 83, which prescribes the duties of the Committee on the Judiciary; and then I would like to have read whatever rule it is which prescribes the duty of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. And we will then see how perfectly the rule covers such a case as this.

The Clerk read Rule 83, as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary to take into consideration such petitions and matters or things touching judicial proceedings as shall be presented, or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient.—June 3, 1813.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I want to meet this question, if it is to be raised now, and have it finally determined.

The SPEAKER. The question of order as stated is raised.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The question having heretofore been raised and decided, I think it is not proper to raise it now. But whenever the question is raised I will show this House from the record of its past proceedings that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is entirely mistaken when he charges that the Committee on Revision of the Laws was organized merely for the purpose of revising the statutes. I shall demonstrate to this House that the committee was organized in 1868 and clothed with all the powers possessed by the old standing committee on revisal and unfinished business. I will show further that while that gentleman occupied a seat on this floor, and while Mr. Poland, of Vermont, was chairman of the committee, bills were referred to that committee, reported by the committee back to the House and passed by the House, concerning many of the important features of the Statutes at Large.

There was a bill in regard to the bankrupt law introduced and rereferred to that committee, which was reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws by Mr. Poland and passed by the House. A bill was introduced and referred to that committee affecting the collection of the customs providing for punishing smugglers, which was reported back from the committee to the House and passed. A bill also was referred to that committee, and General Butler, of Massachusetts, reported it back from the committee, regulating the practice with regard to appeals, which after long debate was passed.

Now, if this question is raised I want an opportunity to present the record and authorities to sustain the right of the Committee on Revision of the Laws to hold jurisdiction of these subjects.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that in reference to this bill the facts are that its reference to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was an act of this House; that subsequently the House received a report from that committee upon this bill, which report was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask (not to interrupt the Chair) whether this bill came in through the petition-box?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It was introduced by myself and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. CONGER. That does not answer my question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I say emphatically that it did not go through the petition-box.

Mr. CONGER. That does answer my question. Now, sir, the rule says that matters relating to judicial proceedings when presented shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; when presented by anybody in this House it is the duty of the Chair to have those matters referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, unless another motion is made.

Whenever this bill, revising as it does so many provisions of the law and so many provisions relating to the jurisdiction of the courts, both of the State and of the United States, is brought into this House, it seems to me that the committee specially designated to take charge of such judicial proceedings and judicial questions should have the investigation and the consideration of this question.

I say that the rule upon this subject is divisible. Such questions when "presented" are to be referred to that committee; and all questions ordered by the House are to be referred to that committee. Now, what is referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws? The rule upon that subject is a perfect blank. The rule assigns that committee no duty. It is an honorary committee, not expected to have duties to perform from day to day during the sessions of Congress, but intended to take charge of such revisions of law, such compilations of the law, mere technical and formal proceedings, as do not require changes in jurisprudence. That is the object and that has been the business of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

During the last few years they have had very important duties to perform. They had the revision of the great body of our statutes, of the comparison, of the examination of the statutes, and to report to the House whether the Revised Statutes in their entirety and in their several parts had been prepared according to the law which Congress had passed respecting that revision.

Now, I care but little what committee takes charge of this particular bill. I have not examined its provisions very thoroughly. I only assume that it is like a bill which was before the Committee on the Judiciary of the last Congress, which had examination and discussion in that committee, and which, as the chairman of the present Committee on the Judiciary and of the then committee says, was reported upon by that committee to this House and placed upon the public Calendar for action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to decide the point of order upon the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope the Chair will allow me to reply to one or two points made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] relating directly to the point of order. Justice to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws demands that I should make this answer.

I must express my surprise, Mr. Speaker, that one who has held a seat on this floor so long as the gentleman from Michigan should be so far mistaken as to the history of this committee and the practice of the House in the past, even during his own continuance on this floor, as to the business referred to and emanating from this committee.

Mr. CONGER. I will say to the gentleman that I simply read from the Manual.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am aware of what the gentleman read. But I am not governed by the compilation of the rules as made by the Clerk. I am governed by the recorded proceedings of Congress; and if the record in any case has escaped the notice of the compiler of those rules, I apprehend the House will not be foreclosed from ascertaining from its record what is the actual jurisdiction of this committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the Congressional Globe, showing the organization and jurisdiction of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. It is the report of the proceedings of the House, July 25, 1868:

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to make at this time a privileged report from the Committee on the Rules, to which there will be no objection. That committee has instructed me to report a rule establishing, instead of the present Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business, a committee on the revisal of the laws, to consist of nine members, their duties to be the same as those of the present Special Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Poland] is chairman of the Select Committee on the Revision of the Laws and also of the standing Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business, the latter committee never having any business. If there be no objection, the rule proposed by the Committee on the Rules will be adopted.

There was no objection.

Mr. KNOTT. Now, if the gentleman will allow me a question, I I would like him to state what were the duties of the Select Committee on the Revision of the Laws?

The SPEAKER. That issue, the Chair thinks, is not raised in this case at all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to settle this question now, if the Speaker will permit me. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws was substantially a new committee charged with the duties which had previously devolved upon the standing Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business and the special Committee on the Revision of the Laws, Mr. Poland having been chairman of both committees; and, as I have read from the record, the House unanimously adopted the proposition.

Mr. KNOTT. I again ask the gentleman what were the duties of the Select Committee on the Revision of the Laws? He has read from the record, to show that the standing Committee on the Revision of the Laws was to have the same duties as had belonged to the Select Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will read again for the benefit of my friend from Kentucky:

That committee has instructed me to report a rule establishing—

What?

instead of the present Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business——

Mr. KNOTT. Read on.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, (reading:)

a Committee on the Revisal of Laws—

Another committee——

Mr. KNOTT. Read on.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, (reading:)

to consist of nine members—

The record here states explicitly, and no one can deny——

Mr. KNOTT. Will my friend read a little further?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will finish the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is not material to the point raised in this case.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But the controversy is raised, and I hope the Chair will allow me to settle it now so that discussion may be avoided in the future.

Their duties to be the same as those of the present Special Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. KNOTT. Now what were the duties of that special committee?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will state at once. The duties of one of these committees, the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business were fixed in 1795, when it was declared that this committee should have jurisdiction over every bill that had been introduced in and was unfinished at the last session. It was a committee on unfinished business. Now, then, this committee is also——

Mr. KNOTT. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me get through with one question at a time. Now I answer the gentleman that this Committee on the Revision of the Laws by the words in the Globe was established "instead of the present Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business," and succeeds to all unfinished business. This very bill was introduced in the last Congress and referred to the committee of which my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] was chairman. It might as well have been referred to the tomb of the Capulets. That committee made no report on it, and, without any disrespect to that committee, I will say that I fear if the bill is now referred to the Judiciary Committee it might as well be buried in the crypt of the Capitol. I do not think that committee will ever report upon it.

Mr. KNOTT. We reported the bill back in the last Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My friend is mistaken. This bill was never reported back. I introduced the bill and felt great anxiety about it, and I watched its fate closely.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does my friend from Illinois mean to say that under the rules the Committee on the Revision of the Laws takes jurisdiction of all bills introduced in the last Congress and unfinished?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The resolution of 1795 organizing the Committee on Unfinished Business, of which this committee is a successor, explicitly declares that it shall have jurisdiction over all business undisposed of at the last session.

Mr. CONGER. But it does not say at the last Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. At the last session. I used the words with care.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No, sir, I cannot yield at present. I knew that the question would be raised——

Mr. REED. I raise the point that the gentleman is not now speaking to the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am discussing the point of order.

Mr. REED. I raise my point for the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois had better discuss the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am discussing it.

Mr. REED. Does the Chair rule that the gentleman is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the gentleman must discuss the point of order only.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am discussing it.

Mr. REED. I call the attention of the Chair to the question whether the gentleman is discussing the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has responded to that call, and has remarked to the gentleman from Illinois that he must discuss the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan has asked whether the rule referred to business coming from a previous Congress. Sir, the session of December, 1795, in which this rule was adopted, was the first session of a Congress; so that the rule referred explicitly to the unfinished business of a previous Congress; and in proof of this I can refer to the Annals of Congress, showing that the committee took charge of bills that had been referred to committees in the previous Congress and which had not been acted on.

I want to make one further observation, and then I will be through with this discussion. After that committee had been organized Mr. Poland was made chairman of it. I hold in my hand a list of some of the bills which were introduced and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, running through the sessions of 1870, 1871, and 1872. From the character of these bills gentlemen will discover that this committee was not a special committee simply for the purpose of revising the statutes, but that it had a broader jurisdiction under the rules and the practice than the Judiciary Committee. One bill which had been referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was reported by Mr. Poland, authorizing the Departments to take testimony in claims pending before them. That was introduced, discussed and debated, and adopted by the House. Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, reported an amendment to the bankrupt law, which had been referred to that committee. That was in 1871. It was discussed, debated, and adopted. Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, who was also a member of that committee, reported a bill regulating the practice in appeals from the circuit courts, which was debated for several days and passed.

Mr. REED. Is this discussing the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not. The gentleman should confine himself to the actual point of order made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am only calling attention to precedents of the House which show the proper jurisdiction of this committee.

The SPEAKER. That is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If this bill does not come properly from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, then the Judiciary Committee cannot except by usurpation take control of the subject for the reason that the rule establishing that committee does not confer such jurisdiction upon it; its jurisdiction is confined alone to matters of judicial procedure.

Mr. REED. I should like to know how many times we have to make the point of order. Here is the point of order I made on this discussion, and the Chair has ruled in my favor every time, and yet the gentleman continues to go on talking.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will continue to rule in the same direction. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. It is time the matter was settled.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is exhausting his time in the morning hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not understand that this is coming out of my hour.

The SPEAKER. It is coming out of the morning hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am willing to have this question settled now, even if it consumes my whole hour.

Mr. REED. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This committee has been greatly ignored during the past two years, perhaps because the Committee on the Judiciary has encroached upon its rightful jurisdiction without meeting resistance.

The SPEAKER. The point of order, as the Chair understands, raised by the gentleman from Michigan is this, that this bill properly belongs to the Judiciary Committee. The Chair does not undertake to express any opinion thereon, but he does decide that it is too late now to raise that question. A brief recital of the facts as to this bill will show to the House, the Chair thinks, that it is too late. This bill was introduced in the House by the gentleman from Illinois during the morning hour on Monday, in his place and in his representative capacity. It was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. That committee considered the subject and directed the gentleman from Illinois to report the bill back to the House. The House again recognized the fact that the bill was in the custody of that committee by ordering it to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The Chair maintains that it is now too late to remedy the error, if there be any, in the way proposed. If the previous question has been demanded, then to reach the question the demand for the previous question must be voted down, and then the sense of the House can be tested as to whether this subject properly belongs to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws or should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The point of order, for the reason stated, is overruled.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish the gentleman would allow me a single moment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not wish it to come out of my time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will make it brief.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I cannot yield now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say for myself that I disclaim even the remotest desire to cast any reflection upon the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and I trust they will not take the opposition I have made to two or three of their bills as arising in any way out of any opposition to that committee. I do think the House ought by their co-operation and consent to fix the status and scope of the business of that committee in the rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why did not you raise that objection before we brought in an important amendment to the law?

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to say that there is a rule that prescribes the duties of the committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. I object to all this discussion as to the merits of a rule of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is vitally important to us to continue the codification of the laws, and we have a right to expect from this committee reports in that direction only.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I decline to yield further.

Mr. ORTH. Before the gentleman proceeds to the discussion of the bill I desire to offer an amendment on behalf of the minority of the committee.

Mr. URNER. I also desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will ask my friends to wait until I am through with the statement of the nature of this bill. Then I will allow the amendments to be offered.

Mr. Speaker, in presenting this bill I feel impressed that we should approach the discussion of any question affecting the judiciary free from partisan feeling or partisan motives. The bill I have reported here has no mere political ends in view. It is a question which affects the material welfare and convenience of those interested in legal affairs. Therefore I trust it will not be drawn into passionate political controversy. The bill provides for the repeal of certain sections of the Revised Statutes authorizing the removal of causes from State courts to Federal courts and for modifying other sections of the same nature. The first section we propose to repeal is 639, the first paragraph and clause of which is as follows:

SEC. 639. Any suit commenced in any State court wherein the amount in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $500, to be made to appear to the satisfaction of said court, may be removed for trial into the circuit court for the district where such suit is pending next to be held after the filing of the petition for such removal hereinafter mentioned, in the cases and in the manner stated in this section.

First. When the suit is against an alien, or is by a citizen of a State wherein it is brought, and against a citizen of another State, it may be removed on the petition of such defendant, filed in said State court at the time of entering his appearance in said State court.

There are two other clauses that I shall read and refer to in a moment. This clause contains the law of removal as enacted in the twelfth section of the original judiciary act. From the organization of the Federal judiciary in 1789 down to 1866 the only grounds upon which causes could be removed from State courts to the Federal courts on account of citizenship were those stated in the first clause of this section. If gentlemen have studied the rulings of the courts in regard to this clause and have paid attention to its reading, they have found that, omitting the cases of aliens, the only instances in which causes could be removed under it from State courts to Federal courts are those where all the defendants are non-residents of the State where the suit is brought and where every one of the defendants concur in the petition for removal; further, that no suit could be removed from a State court if any of the plaintiffs were not residents of the State where the suit was brought, or if any of the defendants were citizens of the same State with the plaintiff, or if the defendant answered or submitted to the jurisdiction of the State court before applying for the removal.

Thus the law stood, unchanged, from 1789 to 1866, a period of seventy-seven years. During that period the Federal judiciary possessed one excellent quality of a good system—permanency. Most of the legislation on this subject has been enacted since that period.

But little complaint was made prior to 1866 for the reason that few cases had been transferred from the State courts to the Federal courts, but in 1866 Congress enlarged the right of removal and made an enactment which is substantially embraced in the next clause of this section and reads as follows:

Second. When the suit is against an alien and a citizen of the State wherein it is brought, or is by a citizen of such State against a citizen of the same and a citizen of another State, it may be so removed, as against said alien or citizen of another State, upon the petition of such defendant, filed at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause, if, so far as it relates to him, it is brought for the purpose of restraining or enjoining him, or is a suit in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as concerns him, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause. But such removal shall not take away or prejudice the right of the plaintiff to proceed at the same time with the suit in the State court, as against the other defendants.

This act is in my judgment unconstitutional and absurd.

Thereby Congress undertook to divide suits allowing that where there were two defendants, one a non-resident and one a resident, the case could be divided or split into two, and one-half be transferred to the Federal courts, leaving the other half in the State courts. If the causes carried up to the Federal court came on for trial upon the same day which the other portion of the cause was called for trial in the State courts it would be utterly impossible in many such cases for the plaintiff to properly protect his rights, for neither himself nor his witnesses could be present at both trials.

Judge Dillon, who has perhaps done more by judicial construction to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts than any other jurist, declared:

It may be inferred that Congress doubted the power under the Constitution to authorize the removal of the whole case since part of the case provided for would be between citizens of the same State.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this act, as well as the act of 1875, to which I shall soon call your attention, is unconstitutional for the reason that the Constitution confines the Federal judicial power in regard to citizenship "between citizens of different States," (article 3, section 2,) whereas, as you will soon see, Congress by these acts extends the Federal judicial power to cases between parties of the same State. The act of 1866 was absurd by implying that State tribunals were only capable of trying one-half the case. By this act suitors were annoyed by great inconvenience and unnecessary expense. The next clause of this section to which I wish to call attention is as follows:

Third. When a suit is between a citizen of the State in which it is brought and a citizen of another State, it may be so removed on the petition of the latter, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, filed at any time before the trial or final hearing of the suit, if, before or at the time of filing said petition, he makes and files in said State court an affidavit, stating that he has reason to believe and does believe that, from prejudice or local influence, he will not be able to obtain justice in such State court.

In order to such removal the petitioner in the cases aforesaid must, at the time of filing his petition therefor, offer in said State court good and sufficient surety for his entering in such circuit court, on the first day of its session, copies of said process against him, and of all pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in the cause, or, in said cases where a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought is a defendant, copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in the cause concerning or affecting the petitioner, and also for his there appearing and entering special bail in the cause, if special bail was originally requisite therein. It shall thereupon be the duty of the State court to accept the surety and to proceed no further in the cause against the petitioner, and any bail that may have been originally taken shall be discharged.

When the said copies are entered as aforesaid in the circuit court, the cause shall there proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process, and the copies of pleadings shall have the same force and effect, in every respect and for every purpose, as the original pleadings would have had by the laws and practice of the courts of such State if the cause had remained in the State court.

This third clause embraces mainly the features of the act of 1867 and the act of 1875.

These acts added largely to the hardships of resident litigants. Prior to the act of 1867 it was necessary that the petition for removal should be filed "at the time of entering his appearance in the said State court," but the law of 1867 and 1875 provided that the petition might be "filed at any time before the trial or final hearing of the suit." This was the first instance in any country where the common-law system prevails that the plaintiff could turn his back upon the forum of his own selection and drag his antagonist into another court in the same suit.

Some very peculiar decisions were made in cases arising under these statutes.

In the case of Johnson vs. Monel the plaintiff was a citizen of Iowa; one of the defendants was a resident of Nebraska, the other was a citizen of New York. The case was tried in the State court of Iowa and a verdict rendered against the plaintiff. A motion was made for a new trial and the verdict was set aside. But the plaintiff in the suit, under the authority of this law, after his case had been submitted to a jury in a forum of his own choosing, carried the case by petition into the Federal court. And the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the plaintiff in the privilege of further harassing the defendants by dragging them from the jurisdiction where they were first assailed into one more expensive.

I will cite a case which arose in Ohio, which was perhaps a more grievous abuse. It was the case of Insurance Company vs. Dunn, (19 Wall., 214.) An insurance company was sued in the State court. The appearance of the defendant was entered by its counsel, and the case was tried. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. Under the laws of Ohio it seems that the filing of a bond vacates the judgment or verdict. The insurance company, after submitting to the jurisdiction of the Ohio State court, after a verdict had been rendered, filed its bond, turned its back upon the State jurisdiction, turned its face to its next friend, the Federal court, and before the order to set aside was made removed the case. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the application was in time, that the case was removable, and nullified the judgment of the State court.

That law still remains in force; it is unrepealed. Under this law a powerful corporation may submit itself to the jurisdiction of the State court, and if dissatisfied with its action it may afterward scorn its decision, defy its mandates, and put itself under the sheltering wing of the Federal judiciary.

In 1875 much larger latitude was given to the removal of causes from State courts than was given by any previous enactment. Prior to 1875 the right of removal was confined to the defendant. This act extended the right to either party, whether plaintiff or defendant, or to either one or more of the parties if non-resident.

Now, notice the effects of this law. If there are one hundred plaintiffs to a suit in a State court and one happens to be a non-resident, that one non-resident has it in his power to remove the case from the jurisdiction of the State court to the Federal court. Or if there are a hundred defendants and all save one residents of the State where suit is brought, the one defendant who is a non-resident has it in his power to transfer the case to the Federal court. The bill which I have reported here repeals that section and all the clauses which I have enumerated.

In order to quiet the apprehensions of gentlemen who may be jealous of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, I wish to say that I have as much veneration and respect for the Federal judiciary as it deserves, possibly as much as any one on this floor, when it acts within its proper limits. When acting within the confines established for it by the Constitution I stand ready to concede and defend its rightful powers. I entertain the highest admiration for the great minds that have illuminated that bench, and share in the pride of any of my countrymen who are sensible of the glory it has reflected upon our country. But whenever the Federal judiciary steps beyond the boundary of its rightful powers and encroaches upon the jurisdiction of the State judiciary I would be unfaithful to my trust on this floor if I did not repel such invasion and seek to establish a protection for the independence and dignity of the State judiciary.

Before proceeding further, it will be well for me to indicate what this bill does not do.

It does not in any degree interfere with the original jurisdiction of the Federal courts. We do not seek to take away from those courts one single case which may now be instituted in them under the original judiciary act of 1789 or under any authority conferred upon them by subsequent acts of Congress. We do not by this bill seek to interfere with the right to remove any case from a State court which, as now provided in the statutes, arises under the Constitution and involves a constitutional question, or any question arising under treaties; nor do we seek to interfere with the right to remove from the State courts any case which affects foreign embassadors, ministers, or consuls.

We do not propose to disturb the right of removal of any case arising under maritime or admiralty laws. Nor do we interfere with any suit between States, nor any suit where a State is a plaintiff and a citizen of another State is the defendant; nor any civil suit against any officer of the revenue or any election officer; nor any civil suit arising under the civil-rights bill; nor in cases where corporations created by the Federal Government are parties. The bill which was originally introduced by myself did go further than it does now, as it has been amended by the committee. I believe that we should repeal some of the grounds for removal which we have left untouched and as already enumerated.

But I have yielded to the almost unanimous action of the committee in these amendments, and cordially advocate the bill as amended. In the time left to me I desire to draw attention to the reasons which impelled me to introduce this bill and which I trust may lead this House to pass it.

In the first place, with its overcrowded dockets and as the law is administered in the Federal courts, it is almost impossible to obtain the termination of suits without long delay and great expense. This is especially so in the Supreme Court. During the last term of that court there were upon its docket over eleven hundred cases. Less than four hundred of these cases have been disposed of.

I have been informed by the best authorities that the cases now in the Supreme Court cannot in due course of its business reach final adjudication within three years. If this is so, when will the new cases, ever flowing into that court, be terminated? It has been ascertained that in the circuit and district courts of the United States there were during the term ending on the 1st day of July, 1878, about fifty-four thousand cases on the dockets, and that only about one-third of that number of cases were disposed of in those courts. If that be true, when will the remainder go off the dockets?

In order to provide a remedy for this condition of these courts the Attorney-General of the United States makes these suggestions in his last report:

In the Supreme Court the business is usually at present from two years and a half to three years behind, and it is impossible that this accumulation can be diminished while so large an amount is annually added to it. The cases (apart from those taken thither for delay, which are sometimes found upon its docket as upon those of other appellate courts) are of the gravest character, involving necessarily elaborate discussion and laborious examination. It cannot be expected that more can be decided than are now disposed of in the annual session, or that any assiduity on the part of the distinguished magistrates who compose the court will enable them to accomplish more than that which they now do. The evils which the delay of justice occasions are too obvious to require discussion, and the consideration of Congress is respectfully called to some appropriate remedy. It is not to be found in any increase of the number of judges of the Supreme Court, and must be sought in some system by which a tribunal shall be created intermediate between the supreme and the circuit courts. While the principal portion of the duties of such an intermediate tribunal should be performed by the judges of the circuit court, the litigation in this as well as the Supreme Court has of late become so large that, before any more duties can be imposed upon its judges, an addition should be made to their number. For several years there has been a most pressing want of an additional judge in the second circuit, and it is now doubtful whether one such judge would enable that court, even if there is no increase in the duties to be performed by its judges, to transact its regular business. In some other circuits, but to a less degree, the business of this court has fallen behind, while in none is it kept up except by the greatest industry on the part of the judges. It is but just to say in each circuit all is done which can fairly be expected from its judicial force. If, therefore, an intermediate court of errors and appeals is to be created, which shall relieve the Supreme Court of a part of its jurisdiction, it can be done advantageously only by adding to the number of circuit judges; and by the same plan the business of the circuit courts can also be expedited.

While I do not insist that the question of economy fully furnishes a sufficient cause to control our course on this measure, yet in this period of financial distress it certainly should have consideration in connection with other reasons governing our action. We should avoid increasing the present heavy burden of taxation whenever we can properly do so. Now, the Attorney-General suggests that Congress make provision for the enlargement of the Federal bench, and for the establishment of an intermediate tribunal between the Supreme Court and the circuit courts. I believe this expensive method can be avoided by the passage of this bill. I am informed that nearly one-third of the causes that reach the Federal dockets are brought from State courts upon petitions for the removal of causes. What does this fact teach us? That if we want to avoid the increase of taxation by the establishment of a new court and the enlargement of the present Federal bench, some such remedy as this should be adopted. This bill will probably cut off one-third of the causes going into the Federal courts, and thereby may entirely save the necessity for enlarging the machinery of the Federal judiciary. A question so largely in the direction of economy is surely a proper subject to be taken into consideration in this connection.

The expenses of the Federal courts are growing very rapidly of late years. In order that we may know something of its rapid increase I will call your attention to the following figures, furnished to me by the bureau of statistics:

1860	936,477 61
1865	1,192,272 84
1870	2,162,109 82

From this it will be seen that in less than ten years after Congress passed the act I have referred to, in 1866, or after Congress began to increase the grounds for removal of causes from State courts, the expenses of the Federal judiciary increased threefold, or from about $1,100,000 to $3,300,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to one reason which as much as anything else operated upon my mind in bringing this bill before Congress. In the State of Illinois—I presume it is so in other States—no case can be retained upon the State docket where a foreign corporation is a party. Generally when a suit is instituted against an insurance company—fire or life—or against a railroad company, it is discovered by some pretext or other that the company has the right to remove the cause into the Federal courts. I never could see the reasons for the decision of the Supreme Court where it declares that a corporation has the power of removing a case from a State court. It has, however, been so decided. The Constitution of the United States explicitly declares that only "citizens" have the right to remove causes from State to the Federal courts. The word "citizens" is explicitly used in the Constitution. The word "corporation" does not appear at all in the judicial clause. But the court has decided that a corporation may be considered for this purpose a citizen and therefore has a right to remove its causes into the Federal courts.

This decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has rendered it necessary for us to have a new definition of the word "citizen." As defined by Worcester and Webster, it is one who has the right of citizenship, a being of flesh and blood, a being possessed of a soul, one who can in this country exercise the right of suffrage. But a thing, which Sir Edward Coke said hath no soul—a thing without flesh or blood, a mere fiction of the law—has been clothed by the Supreme Court for this purpose with all the rights and privileges of citizenship; and the court has held that an insurance company organized in London may be considered as an alien; that a railroad company whose lines extend into another State may be considered as a citizen of another State; and under this clause of the Constitution, as construed by the Supreme Court, whenever the suit is brought against such a corporation it is allowed to remove that suit into the Federal courts.

What results from this? I can mention several cases now in my mind which are somewhat like this, where a widow whose husband was a man of toil and had insured his life in an eastern insurance company having a capital of millions. His widow brought suit upon the policy in the State courts of Illinois, over two hundred miles from where a Federal court is held. During his life the husband had denied himself and his family many of the comforts of life in order that he might be enabled to regularly pay his premiums upon the policy. When the suit was instituted in the State courts the attorney of the insurance company filed a petition and had the case removed to the Federal court at Springfield, two hundred miles away. It became necessary for her, as the case was litigated, to take her witnesses with her to Springfield to await the slow progress of business in the Federal court; and when the suit was finally disposed of in the United States circuit court the attorney of the insurance company appealed the case to the Supreme Court sitting here in Washington, a thousand miles away.

This is but an illustration of cases that are occurring at nearly every term of the State circuit courts in Illinois, and possibly in every State of the Northwest. The object of this bill is to remedy such abuses; to secure to every citizen that essential attribute of good government and the right derived from Magna Charta—the dispensation of justice freely, without delay, and that it shall be within the easy reach of all; that the right of trial by jury shall be inviolate; and that the trial shall be, as far as practicable, by jurors of his own vicinage.

I want to call the attention of the House to another question which in my judgment is important. It is the danger of conflict between the judicial powers of the States and those of the Federal Government. We are all aware that the Government under which we live is dual in its character. The State government is a miniature of the Federal Government. Each have governmental departments which are separate and which by the Constitution are intended to be independent of each other. So long as the Federal Government confines itself to its own proper limits there never will be any danger of conflict between the Federal and State authority. Whenever the governments of the States confine themselves within their legitimate domain there can be no danger of conflict with the Federal Government. But, sir, by insidious construction of judges upon the Federal bench, who assume to themselves the power to determine the extent of their jurisdiction, and who seem to go upon the theory that in order to be good judges it is necessary that they should always enlarge their jurisdiction whenever they have power to do so—by means of construction of Federal judges and acts of Congress the boundaries between the State and Federal judiciary, although clearly marked in the Constitution, have become so confused that they cannot be discovered. I am not alone, sir, in expressing the fear that the time may arrive, as we are now going on, when there will be imminent danger of a conflict between the judicial powers which may shake this Government to its foundation. Let me call attention to what was said by Judge Story in his great Commentaries on the Constitution:

> If State courts should deny the constitutionality of the authority to remove suits from their cognizance, in what manner would they be compelled to relinquish the jurisdiction? In respect to criminal cases there would be at once an end of all control, and the State decisions would be paramount to the Constitution; and though in civil suits the courts of the United States might act upon the parties, yet the State courts might act in the same way, and this conflict of jurisdiction would not only jeopard private rights but bring into imminent peril public interests.—2 Story's Const., 1746.

A case arose in Wisconsin which might have resulted in a dangerous conflict of jurisdiction. The Legislature of that State enacted a law allowing insurance agents to do business there on condition that they would agree not to remove suits against them from the State into the Federal courts. An insurance company accepted the privilege on that condition, but after it had gone into business in that State, a suit arising against it, the company disregarded the agreement with the State of Wisconsin and disregarded the act of the Legislature, removed the suit from the State to the Federal court. The Supreme Court of the United States sustained the right of the company to the removal, and held that the act of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin was null and void, thus giving to this insurance company the right not only to spurn the jurisdiction of the State court, but to defy the State law and nullify a contract which it had solemnly entered into.

Suppose the State courts of Wisconsin had refused to recognize the validity of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, what would have been the result? The State court would have gone on with the proceedings before it, and on final adjudication have armed with its process the sheriff, and the Supreme Court of the United States would, on its final adjudication, have armed the United States marshal with its process, and the two officers would have been left to decide the conflict of jurisdiction by physical force. There should be no trouble in this regard. In order that there may be no difficulty in the future the boundary line between the two jurisdictions should be settled beyond all controversy. This can be done best by preventing the removal of causes from one jurisdiction into the other.

All powers conferred upon the Federal Government are found in the express grants of the Constitution, while all the remaining powers not prohibited by the Constitution to the States remain with the States and the people. An examination of the Constitution will show that there is but one single Federal judicial tribunal which receives any power directly from the Constitution of the United States, and that is the Supreme Court. To be sure the Constitution says that Congress may create inferior tribunals, but it does not anywhere directly confer any authority upon those inferior tribunals. It is held in Kent's Commentaries that the inferior Federal court possesses no powers save those which come to it by acts of Congress. I do not suppose any one doubts the accuracy of this declaration; and that in all criminal cases which rightly come under their jurisdiction there must be an act of Congress clearly defining the crime and fixing a punishment. Notwithstanding this we have a vexed case in the State of Virginia, arising under the law of removal, producing a conflict between the Federal judiciary and the State courts. Two men were indicted in the State court for murder, and although the cases were twice tried and one of the men sentenced to the State penitentiary for a term of years, yet a Federal judge has issued a writ of habeas corpus under which the marshal has seized the prisoners who were confined in the State prison, and they are held for trial in the Federal court.

Now, sir, this is a question which ought to interest the lawyers on this floor and induce them to find some way to avoid such dangerous conflicts between the two jurisdictions. If you examine the powers conferred upon the judiciary of the United States you will find that parties indicted for murder in the State court cannot be convicted and punished by a Federal court; not because the facts may not justify the conviction, but because the Federal judiciary has not, under the law, authority to try a case of murder committed in violation of the laws of a State. The jurisdiction of the United States over homicide is confined to cases arising upon the high seas, arising in forts and arsenals, arising in territory where the United States has exclusive jurisdiction. It has never been asserted by any judge on the Federal bench that the Federal judiciary has power to try a man for a crime committed against the law of a State.

Mr. WARNER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX.) It has.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes of his hour remaining.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the bill relating to coinage and coin certificates.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to give notice that at the termination of business this afternoon I will ask that the House take a recess for an evening session for debate only, and that to-morrow at three o'clock I will move to close general debate on the bill. I will then ask the House to proceed to take up the bill for consideration by sections as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FRYE. Has the gentleman from Ohio asked that the House should take a recess this afternoon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman gives notice that at the proper time he will ask that the House take a recess. He further gives notice that he proposes to move to close general debate on the bill at three o'clock to-morrow.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, that it may be printed.

There was no objection. Mr. SPRINGER'S amendment is as follows:

Substitute for section 3 of H. R. No. 564.

SEC. 3. That section 3520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 3520. Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into bars of fine silver or coined into standard dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, as herein provided, and no deposit of silver other than as herein provided shall be received. No deposit shall be of less value than $100, nor of bullion unsuitable for the operations of the mint. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the bullion so deposited to be coined into standard silver dollars to the capacity of the mints in connection with other coinage authorized by law. He shall ascertain the market value of all silver bullion at the time it is deposited, and he shall issue therefor certificates in denominations of not less than $5 corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes, each dollar indicated in such certificates to represent 412½ grains of standard silver; and said certificates to the amount of the market value of the bullion so deposited shall be paid to the person depositing the same, and the remaining certificates, representing the difference between the market value of the bullion and the nominal value of the certificates shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States, and shall be deemed a part of the current revenue. The certificates issued in pursuance of this section shall be received at par in payment of all dues to the United States, including duties on imports, and shall be a legal tender in payment of the ordinary and current expenses of the Government, and shall be redeemed by the United States on demand in standard silver dollars to the amount such coin may be in the Treasury, and if such coin be not in the Treasury, in silver bullion; and an amount of such bullion or dollars equal to the outstanding silver certificates herein authorized to be issued shall be retained in the Treasury for such redemption. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint shall make such regulations for carrying this section into effect as will best protect the interests of the United States.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent to offer to be printed the amendments which I send to the desk.

There was no objection. The amendments proposed to be offered by Mr. BUCKNER are as follows:

Amend:

In line 9, section 8, by striking out "five" and inserting "twenty;" and in line 15, strike out beginning with the word "together" to word "Treasury" in the seventeenth line.

And in line 18 strike out the words "coin and." At the end of the section amend by adding "provided that all certificates for gold or silver bullion shall be rated at the market value of bullion at the city of New York at the time of the deposit."

Mr. URNER. I ask unanimous consent to present an amendment to be printed.

There was no objection. Mr. URNER'S amendment is as follows:

Amend section 1 of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) as follows: Strike out all of section 1 from line 3 to line 7, inclusive.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, the object of thisbill is to reinstate fully and effectually the coinage of silver, and to place gold and silver on the same footing of equality as to coinage. It restores the monetary status of the two metals as it existed before the clandestine passage of the act of March, 1873. It gives us two units of value instead of one, with the old relation between them. It opens the doors of the mints to both metals alike, and the mintage of each is only limited by the capacity of the mints, and this is to be supplemented by the issue of certificates on the deposits of silver bars, as now provided in relation to gold bars. The first sections of this bill apply the laws now applicable to the coinage of gold to that of silver. Section 8 is a departure from existing law as to gold in allowing certificates of silver to be issued as low as five dollars instead of twenty. I think this is an unwise and unnecessary departure, and ought not to be allowed. I am also equally opposed to authorizing the issue of certificates of either gold or silver beyond the actual amount of metal deposited, as provided for in this section, and doubt not that it will be wise to strike out the whole of the section rather than recognize a principle so dangerous and so vicious.

I am free to confess, Mr. Speaker, that I should have preferred a measure that consulted the present unnatural and abnormal condition of the silver market, growing out of admitted governmental interference, rather than correct abstract monetary principles without reference to the circumstances surrounding us. I should have preferred to cast my vote for a measure that looked to the free mintage of silver when coined and bullion silver should be at their normal parity, and until then that the seigniorage should belong to the whole people instead of the fortunate holders of bullion at the passage of the act. I would not only coin the silver dollar to the utmost capacity of the mints, but I would increase that capacity until this Government should force silver to the value which has been taken from it by its action and that of other governments hostile to it. Not that I believe the general purpose and objects of this bill are obnoxious to well-established monetary doctrines or the interests of the people, but because I have apprehensions from a want of proper appreciation of the great questions involved in it, the real friends of full remonetization of silver will be divided and the passage of this act jeopardized.

We have heard, and shall continue to hear, much of the "unjust profit" to be put into the pockets of the bonanza and bullion-holders by free mintage, and of the great wrong of making this country the "dumping-ground" for all the depreciated silver of France and Germany. It was for the purpose of putting a stop to this false clamor and specious clap-trap that I should have preferred to accomplish the same desired results by limiting for the present the silver coinage by the capacity of our mints and the production of our own mines. But, Mr. Speaker, such is the strength and depth of my conviction of the necessity of this Congress taking some decisive and significant action that will indicate the fixed and unalterable purpose of the American people to restore silver to its full equality with gold as a circulating medium that I shall provoke no controversy as to immaterial details, but give this bill my hearty support.

There is no question which has agitated the public mind for the last five years, about which there is so much unanimity among the people of this country. They may differ as to matters of comparative unimportance, but the demand is well-nigh universal that we shall respect the teachings of our fathers and the traditions of the past by holding fast to both gold and silver as the constituents and basis of our circulation. But the voice of America is not so heard and understood in Western Europe, where it is of the highest importance, as well to us as to the other nations of the world, that the sentiment of our people should not be misinterpreted. It will be recollected that the present Secretary of the Treasury, then chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, was in Paris in 1867, at the time of the session of the monetary conference of that year. He was the prompter and abettor of the delegate at that conference from the United States in his efforts to demonetize silver and to adopt the pernicious example of England in wiping out of existence nearly one-half of the monetary circulation of the world.

The monometallic policy of the Paris conference was in a short time carried out by Germany and in this country, the present Secretary of the Treasury being at that time chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and the real or putative father of nearly all the financial measures of the Government from 1867 to the incoming of the present Administration. Since his occupancy of his present high position, he has on all occasions manifested an implacable hostility to bimetalism in his opposition to the Bland bill of the last Congress, in the presidential veto of the Senate compromise bill, in his continuous neglect to coin more than the minimum amount of silver dollars provided by the act of February, 1878, in his complicity with the New York and Boston bankers to nullify an act of Congress and diminish and degrade the lawful money of the country, and last, but not least, in his recommendation in the financial report of last December that the coinage of silver stop at $50,000,000.

It is this conduct on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, avowedly in opposition to the sentiment of the great majority of the people of the United States, which demands rebuke at the hands of the representatives of the people, and makes it our imperative duty to repudiate this recommendation of the finance minister, and by a decisive and emphatic vote make known to the nations of the world that under no circumstances will we bow down in abject worship to the golden calf which he seeks to set up in this great silver country. He almost alone of the men who in 1867 favored an exclusive gold circulation seems to be insensible to the ruin which this iniquitous policy has produced in Germany, England, the East Indies, and in this country. He alone fails to perceive the marked change in the public sentiment of Western Europe within the last twelve years. That change is still going on, and we shall be recreant to our duty if we do not encourage it, and by our legislation proclaim to all whom it may concern that the greatest silver-producing country of the world will never consent that the world's metallic money shall be reduced one-half, and its great mineral product degraded to the level of copper and tin.

Mr. Speaker, the corner-stone on which the proposition of this bill rests is that the present depressed value of silver as measured by gold is not real but relative, and is due solely to hostile legislation and pernicious governmental interference with it. If this be true, and we have participated in this hostile legislation, our plain duty is to reverse our position. If it is not true, this bill should be defeated and we should continue to follow in the wake of England and Germany. Whatever doubts may have been entertained on this point at one time, it is now hardly susceptible of doubt or controversy. I beg to ask the attention of the House to the authority of one of the distinguished delegates of this Government to the Paris conference of last year, Mr. Francis A. Walker, contained in his book on Money, page 266. He says:

> That the changes in the comparative purchasing power of the two metals between 1873 and 1876 were wholly or mainly due to changes in supply or to changes in demand disconnected from the acts of governments dealing with the legal relations of gold and silver I really cannot conceive any intelligent and candid man as now maintaining. That it was so held in perfectly good faith for a year or two after the demonetization I do not doubt.

This statement is no less positive than the opinion of Mr. Bagehot, an eminent English financial writer, in the London Economist, September 2, 1876:

> The cardinal present novelty is that silver and gold are in relation to one another simply ordinary commodities. Until now they have not been so. A very great part of the world adhered to the bimetallic system, which made both gold and silver legal tender, which established a fixed relation between them. In consequence, whenever the values of the two metals altered, these countries acted as equalizing machines. They took the metal which fell; they sold the metal which rose, and thus the relation of the two was kept at its old point. But now this curious mechanism is broken up. There is no great country now really acting on this system. The Latin union, it is true, adhere to the name, but they have abandoned the thing. As they do not allow silver to be coined except in limited quantities, they have no longer an equalizing action. They no longer receive the depreciated and part with the appreciated metal, and the two metals are now exchanged for one another, just as other commodities. The gold price of silver is now like the gold price of tin, for the first time in history, without artificial regulation and free from the manipulations of government.

I might also quote the authority of Mr. Ernest Seyd, who, in his testimony before the English silver commission of 1876, stated with much positiveness that the sole cause of the depression of silver was its demonetization by Germany, and who predicted just such results as have since occurred in England and Germany as the inevitable fruits of the German policy. But let us examine this question in the light of reason and common sense, without reliance upon these high authorities. That both gold and silver receive additional value by their use as money beyond their worth as mere commodities is an admitted truth. Prior to 1873 the Empire of Germany was an exclusively silver-using country, creating a constant demand for it in order to maintain a silver circulation of about $300,000,000. Since 1873 she has been disposing of this silver coinage on the market of London, and proposes not to use silver except for fractional coinage. It is estimated that she has sold between two and three hundred millions of silver; and during the period when this operation began, up to the present time, Germany has been a purchaser of gold to supply the place of her discarded silver.

In servile imitation of everything English, the United States demonetized the silver dollar in 1873, when it was worth 3 per cent. premium over gold, and thus made gold the sole unit of value. And in 1875 we passed the resumption act, ordaining that the entire paper circulation of United States legal-tender notes should be paid in gold and these notes destroyed and canceled as they were presented at the Treasury. As a measure of self-protection, and to prevent her gold coins from being withdrawn by Germany, France, in conjunction with the other members of the Latin union, closed her mints against the further coinage of silver in 1876, and has ceased to be a purchaser of silver bullion. At the incoming of the present Administration the Secretary of the Treasury, under the authority of the gold resumption act, commenced the process of purchasing and hoarding gold for resumption purposes, and has had in the vaults of the Treasury from one hundred to one hundred and seventy-five millions of dollars for the last two years.

Thus we have had three of the great commercial nations of the world absolutely rejecting silver as one of the money metals, except for token or fractional currency, and the fourth, (France,) representing seventy millions of people, inhabiting the Latin union, out of the silver market entirely, and not permitting the coinage of a single franc. The United States alone has been a purchaser of silver bullion to the amount of $2,000,000 per month since the spring of 1878. This pittance is little in excess of the annual East India demand on London, which fell off last year to a most insignificant sum, on account of the terrible famine in that unfortunate dependency of Great Britain. With this state of facts as to the demands upon the silver market, does it require any additional argument to prove that it is the hostile action of the governments that has superinduced this decline? Need I insult the intelligence of this House, or of the country, by citing the authority of such distinguished political economists as Walowski, Seyd, Walker, Cernuchi, and a host of others, who ascribe the cheapness of silver, as measured by gold, to its demonetization, either in whole or in part, by the four great civilized nations of the earth.

But to make this proposition so plain that all lingering of doubt shall be dispelled, let it be supposed that these four governments should simultaneously ordain that of the two cereals, wheat and corn, but one of them—corn—should be used for food for man and beast, would it not excite great surprise with every one if the inferior grain should not be worth as much or more than the superior; that wheat would decline and corn advance largely in price? That the production of gold during these years has been declining is not denied, nor has the production of silver been on the increase. So that it is impossible to deny that the reason that the metal in the silver dollar is worth but eighty-five cents in gold or the metal in the gold dollar worth one hundred and eighteen cents in silver is due exclusively to governmental manipulation. And when it is borne in mind that when this manipulation began, in 1873, the silver dollar was worth one hundred and three cents in gold and that since that date instead of an increased there has been a diminished production of silver metal, this conclusion becomes absolutely irresistible.

The next inquiry is as to the effect the action of these governments has had upon gold. Has gold continued at a fixed value while silver has been declining from its normal price in gold—say sixty pence per ounce to fifty pence? In the case I have supposed as to the two cereals, corn and wheat, would wheat decline and corn remain at the same value? Would a day's labor purchase as much gold when silver has declined from the causes stated, or would a day's labor purchase as much corn after its value had been affected in the case supposed? Unquestionably not. Gold is not a fixed, unvarying standard of value as the yard-stick is of length, or the gallon measure of quantity. It is difficult to divest ourselves entirely of the impression that the standard of value, like the standards of weight and quantity, is fixed and unchangeable; and we are too apt to regard gold as unvarying as to value as the foot-rule is as to length. But it is most obvious, the quantity of gold being the same and it being a commodity and product of labor, in addition to being a recognized standard of value, that an increased demand for it will increase its price measured by other commodities. It will require more days' labor or more pounds of wheat, or more pounds of meat, or cotton, to buy the same amount of gold in the one case and of corn in the other.

By the action of Germany not only did silver necessarily decline (assuming the production to remain the same) but gold advanced at the same time, because of her entering the gold market against England and France for its purchase, and when the United States entered the lists in the scramble for gold with England, Germany, and France, in 1877 and 1878, the value of gold measured by commodities or labor necessarily submitted to a large advance. In the language of Wall street, the policy of these governments has been to bull gold and to bear silver. The purchasers of gold have had to pay more of the products of labor for the same number of ounces of gold, while less of the products of labor would buy a like number of ounces of silver. Is this reasoning corroborated by well-ascertained and authentic facts? Do the statistics of production and price since 1873, and since the United States became a competitor with the nations of Europe in the struggle for the world's gold, prove that these conclusions are justified? The New York Public, a financial journal devoted to the single standard, and the echo of Wall street opinions, has prepared tables and investigated the prices of the principal articles of trade from 1859 to 1878, and in case of the more important articles, as far back as 1825, embracing over four-fifths of all the articles entering into the commerce of this country during this period, and thus summarizes the results of its investigations:

> No reason is found to question the substantial correctness of previous comparisons based upon quotations of a much smaller number of the most important representative articles. So close, indeed, is the correspondence of results, that, while the representative articles show a relation of prices in 1860 and 1878 as 100 to 81.60, the comparison of many hundred articles indicates this far a relation of 100 to 81.77. The approximate correctness of the following ratios, reducing quotations to gold, may, therefore, be affirmed, namely, $100 in 1860 equals in purchasing power $126 in 1864, and $124 in 1873, and $81 67 November 1, 1878. The shrinkage in the average gold value of commodities (exclusive of all stocks or bonds and of all real estate) from January 1, 1873, to November 1, 1878, appears to have been about 34.1 per cent.

The London Banker's Magazine, October, 1878, gives a careful summary of facts regarding the diminished production and scarcity of gold, reaching this conclusion:

At the beginning of these remarks it was stated that the variation between the market prices of gold and silver since 1872 had been 17 per cent. If, instead of asserting this to be the fall in silver, we said that silver had fallen 2 per cent. and gold had risen 15 per cent., we believe we should be much nearer the reality.

The London Economist of December 28, 1878, has a long and carefully prepared article on "Fluctuations in the purchasing power of gold." The conclusions of the article are:

We have not touched upon the question of the circulation of bank or statute notes in substitution for gold, nor upon other increased banking facilities, nor yet upon the growth of population in the last ten years. But the fact remains that commodities are much cheaper than they were ten and twenty years ago in periods of great depression in trade, and the same amount of gold, not silver, will buy more of such necessaries of life. Probably gold has risen, while silver has fallen; as nations have competed for the one and discarded the other.

Senator JONES, of Nevada, in his speech on the bill to remonetize the silver dollar, after a very exhaustive discussion of tables of comparative prices, summed up his conclusions thus:

I hazard nothing in saying that under this crucial test it will be found that gold has very nearly doubled in value within the last five years.

In other words, assuming that gold has doubled in value from 1873 to 1879, property of all kinds, exclusive of lands, has fallen in price one-half, so that it requires double as much property to pay the same amount of indebtedness as it required five years ago; and the man that owed a thousand dollars in 1873, if he has to pay it now, practically owes $2,000, and the debt of my State of the nominal amount of seventeen millions is really thirty-five millions. It requires two bushels of wheat, when one would have sufficed in 1873, and two days' labor must be performed, when one would have paid the same debt five years ago. In fact, the debtor who has a debt contracted in 1873 or 1874 and would offer to pay in the silver dollar at its bullion price—eighty-five cents—would find that he had offered to discharge his debt at a ruinous sacrifice to himself, because his property has been depressed by the appreciation of gold in a much greater ratio than the difference between the market value of silver and gold.

This is the experience of every one who will compare the prices of farm products or manufactured articles when gold was the principal medium of circulation in this country, from 1850 to 1860, with the prices of the same articles now. I do not include lands or houses and lots, as their depression in price has been relatively much greater. And yet we are being congratulated that our exports are increasing month by month, that the balance of trade is largely in our favor, and that we are just entering upon a career of prosperity unprecedented in our history. How this can be, with the prices of labor and the products of labor depressed as they are and must continue on account of the highly appreciated value of the standard by which they are measured, passes my comprehension. With untold amounts of debt, individual, corporation, State, and national, to be discharged by the products of labor at gold prices, the future of the laborer and producer of this country is pregnant with gloom and alarm, for our vast exports are but the measure of their sacrifices and the monument of their privations and their suffering.

If, Mr. Speaker, as I have attempted to show, the decline in the relative value of silver is due solely to the absence of demand for it for money uses by the great nations of the world, is there any doubt that by increasing that demand its bullion value would appreciate at once and we should hear no more of the clipped dollars? Increased demand has that effect (the supply remaining the same) upon the price of every other production, and silver bullion cannot make the sole exception. The passage of this bill would be to make the Government in effect a bidder for every ounce of silver raised in the Rocky Mountains, and the certain result would follow that we should use for monetary purposes every year one-half to two-thirds of the silver crop of the world, and to that extent relieve the silver markets of Europe. Such legislation on the part of Congress might well be justified on the ground of protection of our own industries and giving profitable employment to the hardy pioneers who are flocking to the mineral regions of the continent. But it is demanded by the higher considerations of justice to the laboring classes everywhere and of fair dealing to the overburdened tax-payer and unfortunate debtor in every hamlet, town, and village of the Union; for let me remind this House, and especially the Representatives of the East on this floor, that you are deluding yourselves with the hope of prosperity as long as low prices rule and the heavy burdens of debt and taxation are extracting the life-blood of the people.

What are the objections to the full remonetization of silver by this Government and its equalization with gold in its money functions? They have each been the recognized units of value from the organization of the Government to the passage of the coinage act of 1873. Bimetalism and not monometalism was ingrafted on the Constitution, and for more than three-quarters of a century was the policy of all parties in America. Why should we not restore silver to its time-honored place in our monetary system? It is objected that the bill before the House would result in unloading upon us the silver of the world. It may in time give us a portion of the silver of Mexico and the South American States, but not of Europe or any part of it. Germany has about disposed of all her surplus stock, and not a five franc of any of the States of the Latin union or indeed of any other European State would be sent to us, for the reason that it would be shipped to us at a loss to its owner. The European mint valuation of silver is greater by 3 per cent. than ours, and the owner of the silver franc shipping it to New York must submit to the loss of 3 per cent., with freight, insurance, and commission charges added. On this point I beg to read the following, taken from the Banker's Magazine of this month:

Even if the coinage of silver was made free in both France and the United States that metal would flow not from France to the United States, but the other way, and for the plain reason that the mint valuation of silver in France is 3 per cent. higher than at the United States mint. Under the present monetary laws of the European countries no silver can come from Europe except the silver in Germany not disposed of, which is not a great quantity and is being constantly diminished.

But suppose silver from Europe and other countries should flow to us, and should be coined at our mints, or be exchanged for bullion certificates. Will the owners of this silver make us a present of it? Or will they not invest in our wheat, corn, or pork, or some other agricultural mineral, or manufactured product, and thus enhance the price of our productions, and swell the export account of the country? An advance in the prices of our productions is what is needed above all things to give new life to business interests, stimulate enterprise, and to cast aside the habiliments of gloom and depression. And while this process is going on and America is being made the "dumping-ground" of all the silver of the world, what, let me ask, will be the effect on the relative values of gold and silver? If the United States shall use the entire product of her mines, say $45,000,000, and the surplus stock of other peoples, will gold be rated as now at 18 per cent. over silver, or will they not stand upon an equality or nearly so? And will not the example of our country be followed, if not by Germany and England, at least may we not confidently expect that the Latin union will again enter the market for the purchase of silver and the mints of France and Italy be reopened to its coinage? In that event, almost certain to occur in the light of late events, no one can doubt but that the "clipped dollar" would be the equal in value of the gold dollar.

Another objection urged against the free and unlimited coinage of silver as money is that our gold will fly abroad, leaving us nothing but silver. In the published interview of the Secretary of the Treasury with the Coinage Committee, he admits that this will ultimately take place at the present rate of coinage of silver, and with the increase of bank-notes at the rate which is now going on, the escape of his gold from its prison-house may be nearer at hand than is generally anticipated. Low prices, depressed values, and hard times are the conditions on which the gold can be retained in the Treasury vaults, and a slight return of prosperity will assuredly give us bank-note inflation, which is as hostile to his hoards of gold as the coinage of the silver dollar. It is one of the recommendations of the bimetallic system that it recognizes no superiority of one metal over the other, and under the unrestrained operation of the double standard the dearer metal for the time being will flow out and the cheaper will take its place. It is not important to any interest that they should circulate at the same time in the same place. The idea that the dearer the metal the better it is, is entitled to no respect, for dear money necessarily means low prices and depressed business.

If gold becomes scarce and dear the cheaper metal will take its place, and thus the debtor can exercise his option in paying in that metal that is relatively cheaper. We have the present example of France, with six hundred millions of silver five-francs, circulating side by side with the gold twenty-franc. The same is true of Belgium, where the bulk of its metallic circulation is silver, and in neither country has the silver driven out the gold. This will not take place there or here until the channels of circulation are filled to overflowing with money or its representatives. Before the dearer metal can be displaced we must have a sufficiency of other metallic money to answer all the demand of coin. But let us suppose that when we have reached a coinage of $200,000,000 of silver—the capacity of our mints for four years—Secretary Sherman's strong box in New York should be unlocked and his hoard of gold should take to itself wings and fly away. What then? If it finds its home in England, France, or Germany, it would tend to raise the prices of our cotton, corn, wheat, and provisions in these markets and our producers be enriched. Better prices for the products of industry abroad, with moderate prices at home, would greatly enhance the value of our lands and secure the prosperity of the whole people. Silver and silver certificates would take the place of gold, and they would answer all its purposes.

The present condition of the Treasury hoards, both of silver and gold, prove conclusively that our people do not desire to handle either metal. Their preference for paper may yet prove a serious obstacle to a general diffusion of either gold or silver through the channels of circulation and among the masses of the people. Let me say that the Treasury gold is kept here now because of the low price of all merchantable commodities. That was the theory on which contraction of the paper circulation proceeded, and it is the real ground on which free coinage is assailed now. Whenever prices advance so that the products of labor reach a point at which gold can be shipped with more profit than commodities, gold will disappear, to find a resting place where it is relatively dearer and scarcer than it is here. It matters not whether this advance in price is brought about by inflation by bank-notes, United States notes, silver or gold, the fact is that an advance in prices here from any cause is fatal to the continued existence of the hoards of gold in the Treasury. Low prices and hard times are the conditions on which the Secretary can maintain the present resumption sham in gold. Permanent equivalency (and this is all that resumption is) can only be maintained by and through silver.

The present equivalency between gold and paper is more liable to be disturbed in the near future by issues of bank paper than from any other cause. It is being increased now at the rate of from one to millions of dollars per month, and a slight revival of business will convert a large amount of the 4 per cents. into paper circulation. The Secretary of the Treasury has quite as much reason to fear the effects of increased bank circulation on his Treasury reserves as an increase of silver coinage under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, so far in this debate there has been no attempt by either of the gentlemen who have participated in it to refute the controlling and central idea on which this bill is maintained. Neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FISHER] nor my esteemed and venerable friend from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] have deigned to give it a passing notice, nor do either of them assert, except by implication, that the present decline in silver metal is due in whole or in part to overproduction. But on no other theory could they insist upon the coinage of another dollar—of full weight, by putting into it fifty additional grains of silver. A largely increased permanent supply of silver might under other circumstances justify the adoption of such a policy or a diminished supply of gold metal might, in the opinion of those who desire scarce and dear money and consequent low prices, commend it to our consideration.

But if, as Professor Walker says, "no intelligent and candid man" can come to the conclusion that the present apparent decline in silver is the result of natural causes or overproduction, then the proposition to increase the weight of the silver dollar by one-sixth of its present weight amounts to little less than downright robbery of the producing classes. If the present relative values of the two metals must be equalized, justice and equity require that the gold dollar shall be clipped rather than the silver dollar shall be increased in weight. I assert that no well-authenticated statistics show that within the last five or six years there has been any overproduction of silver; but on the contrary there has been a diminished production of both metals, especially of silver. But if, as I think, I have shown that the present decline in silver is relative to gold alone and is due to artificial causes and chiefly if not wholly to improper and unwise governmental interference, the only road out of this artificial depression is full remonetization by the nations of the world.

The United States being the most interested in the production and value of silver, considered as a domestic industry, should take the initiative in this work of restoration and lead the van, and not follow in the wake of other nations. I should have supposed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FISHER] would have been among the last to repudiate the doctrine of protection to home industries, such a favorite in his State; but, Mr. Speaker, it makes all the difference in the world whether the protected article is the coal and iron of Pennsylvania or the silver of Colorado and Nevada.

My esteemed friend from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] says he is in favor of an honest dollar—that is, a dollar whose present value in silver bullion is equal to the gold dollar of 25.8 grains. But I should like for my friend to give any good reason, not inspired by the atmosphere he breathes, why as a matter of right and justice the gold dollar should not be clipped to the weight and dimensions of the silver dollar of the fathers. Is it "honest" to compel the people of this country to pay one-sixth more than their contract demands in liquidation of the 4 per cent. bonds, which have been issued with full knowledge to the holders that they were payable in the silver dollar of 412½ grains? Is it "honest" to take from the substance of the people more than they have agreed to pay, and make a donation of it without consideration to the holders of these bonds? Can he deny that the dollar of 412½ grains, at its present bullion value, eighty-five cents, will purchase more wheat, more corn, more meat, more cotton, and more of any of the products of labor than ever before in the history of the last twenty-five years? Will he deny that seventy-five cents of bullion silver can be exchanged for more lands and houses and lots than a gold dollar would buy twenty years ago? I assert this to be true, and I challenge contradiction.

But, strange to say, my respected friend, just and fair-minded as he is, deludes himself that it is just and right to add to the burdens of the tax-payer and the debtor one-sixth more by diminishing the prices of the products which must pay their taxes and debts. How can this be explained? Why, my venerable friend lives in the delusion that gold is an immutable standard of value, and as unchangeable as the yard-stick or the pound weight, and that increased demand, the supply remaining the same, will affect the value of everything else but gold. Rev. Jasper, of Richmond, enjoys a similar delusion as to the sun being a movable body. He insists that the sun "do move;" so all my friend's arguments presuppose that gold has a fixed, unvarying value, not only as to silver but as to all other things.

But my friend is laboring under another strange hallucination. He told us the other day that our silver dollars are now "locked up in dark vaults, useless and a burden and are outlawed as any other product of our soil would be if overvalued and only vendible by short weights and measures." But is not the "king of metals," for which my friend thinks mankind has an instinctive yearning, equally "in prison" and "locked up in dark vaults," "useless and a burden." In proportion to the amount of the two metals held by the Treasury I venture to assert that more silver dollars have left the prison-house of the Treasury than his darling yellow-boys. Be this as it may, it is an admitted fact that neither gold nor silver coins go into circulation; and the reason for this is the same as to both class of coins. There is no place for either in the channels of circulation, and the people want to handle neither for the same reason. The one and two dollar bills of the banks and the Government fill the place of the silver dollar, just as the higher denominations of paper money fill the place of the eagle and its subdivisions. There is no other reason for the non-circulation of our silver and gold coinage than that the people prefer the paper and have confidence in its security and genuineness. But for the law requiring the fractional currency to be destroyed as it is presented to the Treasury, the subsidiary silver coinage would now be in "prison," "useless and a burden," just as our gold and silver coins now are. If we want to hear the music of the silver dollar and the eagle in our pockets we must make a place for them by canceling and destroying the smaller notes; until that is done the dollar and the eagle will be "imprisoned" in the vaults of the Government and the banks.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the effect of free coinage will be to advance the price of silver bullion in the hands of the holders at the passage of the act to the legal value of the silver dollar. That seems to me to be unavoidable, but after the stock on hand is exhausted it could give neither the owners of mines nor the dealers in bullion any advantage whatever. It would result in enhancing the price of the metal thereafter mined to the level of the silver dollar, or would raise prices generally to the extent of the coinage of the mints and the mineral raised and used for coinage and circulation. But that the single gold standard should be maintained, as argued by my friend from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] because it would be beneficial to the growers of cotton and other productions for foreign exportation, is utterly fallacious. It is the gold standard, highly appreciated now by vicious legislation, that has depressed prices of cotton, wheat, and corn to their present low level.

It is the London and Liverpool price of these articles in gold that determines their value here. Gold has been highly appreciated in value by the increased demand for it growing out of the scramble by the nations using gold. It has become scarce and dear. Gold has advanced more than silver has declined. Dear gold makes low prices for cotton, wheat, and whatever else is controlled in price by the European market. The increased demand for silver growing out of its coinage and use as money here, and to the extent that it shall be recoined and used as money, either in this country or elsewhere, would relieve the strain on the gold market, lessen the demand for the dearer metal, and diminish its value as compared with other articles. These would thus be enhanced in price, and the pound sterling that now only equals $4.87½ would be equal to $5.50, and thus the planter and farmer would obtain more dollars for their labor and be enabled to pay their obligations with less sacrifice.

The effect of this measure would be largely to increase the products of our mines and our hardy miners would be better compensated for their arduous labor. Silver in bullion would appreciate to the value of coined silver, not only here, but in the markets of the world, and we should hear no more of the "clipped dollar," or the "unjust profit" to the holder of bullion, and the toiling masses would rejoice over another victory over the money-lords of the East, who are clamoring for dear money and low prices.

Mr. Speaker, the advocates of silver remonetization occupy a much more favorable vantage-ground before the country than when we passed the compromise Senate bill over the veto of the President. Then it was doubted whether all Europe was not in antagonism to us. Subsequent events have demonstrated that many of the statesmen and economists of France and England sympathize with us, and must sooner or later co-operate with us in restoring silver to its normal status. Time has dissipated all the bugbears and foreboding of evil by which many good men were frightened from our ranks. It was predicted by these false prophets that remonetization would send the gold premium back to its old figures; that our credit would be sacrificed; that our bonds would depreciate; that the refunding process would be arrested, and many other similar fanciful creations were originated for the occasion.

What are the results? Not one of these predictions has been verified. The premium on gold has steadily declined, our bonds advanced here as well as in London, and the entire five-twenty and ten-forty debt has been refunded at 4 per cent., months if not years before any one anticipated such an event. We shall no doubt hear more of such prognostications of evil and ruin. We shall be denounced as lunatics and financial mountebanks by the hireling organs of idle capital and dishonest money-getting; but with truth and justice and reason on our side, and the great mass of the people in all sections sustaining and encouraging us, we need have no apprehension as to the final result. The great American mineral will, in spite of all opposition, soon be restored to its place as the money of the world, and then, and not until then, will our long-lost prosperity begin to return.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the two theories as to money are the metallic and the fiat. The metallic asserts that "money consists of the material and that legislation cannot make or unmake it. The law may exalt or depress temporarily, but cannot destroy. Gold and silver are money in virtue of their superiority and owe none of their rank to law. The extent to which legislation may be exercised with regard to money is to define, quantitatively, the names of coins, to guard against confusion, counterfeiting, &c., by manufacturing them in a public mint, and to save the transportation and abrasion of them by receiving them on deposit and issuing certificates therefor." Such is what is familiarly known as the hard-money theory. On the other hand, the legal-tender or fiat theory asserts that money is conventional, the creature of law, and depends for quantity and quality upon the wisdom and jurisdiction of the authority making it. The material serves only as instrumentality to receive, convey, and execute the fiat of government, whereby the supreme authority creates and regulates the functions of money; and that its superiority depends as in all other cases upon adaptability. Such is what is familiarly known as the greenback theory. According to this theory the credit resultant from the internal and external conditions and relations of a people is the essence of money; and that to waste or abuse by overissue or otherwise would be folly bordering insanity, not to say treason in its most hideous form. It is the inestimable wealth, the life blood of the nation—the whole people. To pervert it to class or corporations would be in morals, as in effect, to drain the national life-blood to make a dainty pudding for an epicure.

In the second section of the bill under consideration occurs the proviso:

> And silver dollars in the Treasury of the United States, when reduced in weight by natural abrasion more than 1 per cent. below the standard weight prescribed by law, shall be recoined.

Contraction! How jealously quantitative!

Again, in section 6:

> When reduced in weight below such standard and tolerance shall be a legal tender at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

Could a fanatic be more devout?

Section 5 provides:

> It shall be lawful also to transmit parcels of the same from time to time to the assistant treasurers, depositaries, and other officers of the United States, for exchange, under general regulations proposed by the Director of the Mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. And silver coins of less denominations than $1, when presented at the Treasury or any sub-treasury or depositories of the United States in sums not less than $20, shall be received in exchange for money of full legal tender.

As paper money of full legal tender is more convenient and worth 1 per cent. more than silver coin, the silver will, as a matter of course, flow into the Treasury, there to remain, and from abrasion be guarded by vestal fire, while paper trash shall be sent forth to perform the menial services of money.

Section 8 provides:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and bullion with the Treasurer or assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor. * * * And the certificates for coin and bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for all dues to the United States, including duties on imports.

Thus 412½ grains of silver, worth only eighty-four cents, the Government supplements with sixteen cents of taxes and duties on imports, so as to raise the quantity to par. Generous indeed to the bullionist, but the sons of toil must trudge and sweat beneath the burdens of taxes and impost duties which this munificence imposes. Why not utilize the credit of the Government to diminish rather than increase the load? No doubt silver from all quarters will rush into the Treasury, and the glittering heaps will pile. But the bullionists will monopolize our revenues and leave us without income to meet current expenses. True, we shall have the silver, but if our mints had adequate capacity, the ninth section of the bill provides:

> That from and after the passage of this act only coins of smaller denominations than $1 shall be fabricated on Government account; and in converting bullion into coin-bars or coin for depositors, precedence shall be given in the order in which deposits are made; but this provision shall not prohibit the delivery of coin or stamped bars in exchange for bullion as soon as its value is ascertained.

> Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint to be formed into bars or into standard dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy for his benefit.

So that not only our revenues, but our mints, shall be at the discretion of bullionists, domestic and foreign, our only compensation and felicity being the precious privilege of worshiping a silver calf. And that this deity may be still exalted, the tenth section faithfully provides:

> That after the passage of this act the President shall signify to such foreign governments as he may deem advisable that the United States is ready to co-operate with other nations in the establishment of a common ratio between gold and silver.

In support of this extraordinary measure it is earnestly insisted that the suffering and down-trodden people must have relief, and since the hard-money democrats and republicans will not permit anything better, we should unite with the "betwixts-and-betweens-willy-wonty-canny-canty-shally-shanty" patriots and transfer our revenues and finances to the tender mercies of bullion syndicates in the hope that they will prove less cruel than democrats and republicans.

"Come into my parlor,"
Said the spider to the fly.

Troy captured a Greek horse and a Sinon. Let the friends of labor, of honest money, money issued and regulated by and in the interest of the whole people, and so guarded in circulation against speculation and private interest as to be as costless as practicable in the exchange of commodities and services, "profit by the example."

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, the people view with alarm the reopening of the currency agitation. With few exceptions they are content with existing law, accept the legislation of the last Congress, and demand that it remain undisturbed until a fair trial at least shall demonstrate the necessity for a change. The Forty-fifth Congress restored the silver dollar to its old place in the coinage of the nation. It forbade the further contraction of the legal-tender notes of the Government and saved to the people for the wants of labor and commerce over $670,000,000 in paper currency. That Congress had not adjourned until this large volume of paper money—greenbacks and national-bank notes, for the first time in fifteen years, were at par with coin. From that time until to-day our dollars—gold dollars, silver dollars, and paper dollars—have been practically equal in their debt-paying and purchasing power. To-day we have a currency of equal dollars. Silver and gold stand abreast, and the paper promise of the Government being readily convertible into coin is the peer of either.

The nation has made good its promises, and after long years of suspension has resumed payment. At last the dollar of the laborer in the field and the workshop is the equal of that of the capitalist and the bondholder. The laboring-man is no longer cheated by false money and delusive promises. Gold and silver float together and each is the equal of the other. Our paper, once so sadly depreciated, is now accepted at par in payment of all debts, duties, and taxes, and for United States bonds. It performs every function of local exchange and is accepted in all business transactions as an accurate standard of values. A depreciated and constantly fluctuating currency no longer disturbs all business and commerce by its uncertainties. Confidence in the stability of our circulating medium, so necessary to prosperity, has been restored after years of anxiety and doubt. I am not willing by any vote of mine at this time to disturb existing conditions. Any change in our monetary legislation will likely unsettle the equality now existing between our several kinds of dollars and bring upon us again a depreciated currency with the whole brood of evils that have plagued us in the past.

To establish uniformity in our silver coinage I will cheerfully support a proposition to take up and recoin the trade-dollar, for I am inflexibly opposed to dishonored dollars, will never knowingly vote to put one out, nor aid in keeping it out if one shall get into circulation. When the Government declares anything a dollar, whether the declaration be printed on paper or stamped on metal, it should be a full dollar in value, equal to any other dollar authorized by it and capable of performing every function of money. Except as to a reasonable issue of subsidiary or minor coins for convenience in small transactions, every dollar fabricated at our mints should be made a full legal tender. And certainly in ordinary times the Government should not force a currency upon its people that it is unwilling to accept itself. All money should be receivable for public dues and revenues to the same extent that it is made legal tender in the payment of private debts. Our legislation heretofore has given the people dollars that were legal tender for debts, dues, and taxes of every description, dollars that would pay some particular obligations and not others, and dollars that were legal tender for nothing whatever. To maintain an equality of value between these dollars would be about as difficult as to make a stick with but one end to it. We have reached correspondence at last, I hope, by ordaining coin dollars of equal value and making our paper convertible into them. Here let the matter rest. If we want expansion, let it be one of real money and such as is recognized by the commercial world. Of that a people is not likely to possess too much. But, sir, this is merely introductory.

I voted for the silver bill as it passed the Forty-fifth Congress, and I am resolved to stand by it until, tested by experience, it shall appear unwise. I am a bimetalist. I want the people to have the largest possible amount of both gold and silver and as much paper as can be surely and readily converted into either at the holder's option. I stand by gold and silver for reasons a thousand times repeated by economic writers:

1. They are convenient. They represent large values and occupy but a small space.

2. They are not subject to loss or deterioration by exposure to heat or cold, fire or water.

3. They are divisible, and may be coined and recoined and made to represent large or small values without loss.

4. The volume of their production is reasonably uniform. They are not subject to those sudden and violent fluctuations that attend the production of other commodities.

Finally, they possess a real value equal to that of the labor required to produce them. They, like corn and wheat and cotton, represent so much of human effort. I am for the double standard, because we produce gold and silver in the sum of $90,000,000 each year and in about equal proportions. During the fiscal year of 1878 our mints coined $47,226,107 in gold and $46,726,421 in silver. This metal product should be utilized and made the bed-rock of our currency system. We make, in my opinion, a grave mistake when we exclude either coin from our money of exchange. We should not exclude silver, for it is an important part of the resources of our people and performs no mean office in making resumption sure. To ignore its money use is to proclaim that we have outlawed a metal that is the sole currency of seven hundred and sixty-eight million people and which constitutes half the money of one hundred and thirty-seven million more. To adopt any legislation that would drive gold from our circulation would be equally unwise, for it is the only standard of values of ninety-two millions of people with whom we have large and intimate commercial relations.

As I favor the circulation of both metals side by side, I cannot approve this bill.

THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

To maintain the double standard, to secure the employment of both metals as money, a substantial correspondence in value between them must be maintained. The experience of all the past, the uncontradicted testimony of all writers of character upon economic science, proves that dollars of unequal value cannot be floated together. The cheaper currency always goes into use and the dearer is hoarded or exported. It is within our memory that for a short time after the first issue of the Treasury note it was at par with the coin dollar and circulated side by side with it, but when the note became the cheaper money gold and silver withdrew wholly from the circulation. But I need not argue a question so old as to lack interest and so easily demonstrated that it has passed for years unchallenged. Now we have reached the question, can we authorize the unlimited coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver and maintain the double standard?

I have read with some interest, sir, the logic of many of the bimetalists of the day, and without an exception, that I can recall, they admit that to make the double standard possible such a ratio between the metals must be fixed as to make them and keep them of equal value. Most of them express the confident belief that that ratio is 15½ of silver to 1 of gold. The history of the production and the use of these metals for a long series of years seemed to justify that belief. What ratio should be fixed between the metals so as to keep them both with us? That was the absorbing question two years ago. Almost every commercial nation in Europe had demonetized silver and was seeking a market for its refuse metal. We had demonetized it for years, new mines had been recently opened, yielding a large product, and so we were left afloat on the broad, uncertain sea of conjecture. It was clear to us then, as the market quotations stood, that 15.98 parts of silver were not equal to 1 of gold, but it was claimed that by restoring to silver its money use its value would appreciate, and by providing for gold so formidable a competitor it would decline, and thus the two would reach a common level. I accepted this logic. To guard against possible mistake, to avoid writing another chapter in the "awful book of human folly," we limited the sum of silver coinage to $4,000,000 per month. We wisely refused to commit the nation to free coinage until the test of a trial had established the true ratio between the metals.

How stands the matter to-day? We can buy the metal in the silver dollar for eighty-three cents. Raise the flood-gates and let in the discarded silver of Europe, and how long can we hold the present silver dollar at par with our other money? We hold it there now solely because we can regulate its issue and keep the supply within our home demand. I look for the time, I believe it is coming, when several of the leading commercial nations of Europe will return to silver, and then we can with safety remove the restrictions now imposed upon its issue. Safety suggests that we stand where we are until experience establishes the true ratio between the metals. Our true policy is to keep both metals in circulation, and legislation that will exclude either is suicidal.

This bill gives

THE PROFITS OF THE SILVER COINAGE TO BROKERS, CAPITALISTS, AND BULLION-OWNERS.

It is legislation in their interest and at the expense of the people. At present we buy silver bullion at the market price, coin it into standard silver dollars, and the profits go to the credit of the people. The Director of the Mint a year or two ago, under the act of 1875, bought on Government account silver bullion, and in coining less than $40,000,000 of minor coins saved to the Treasury over $5,500,000. Had that law made the coinage free these millions would have gone into the pockets of the bullion-owners. As the law now stands the people get the benefit of the difference between the market price of the metal and one dollar, less the cost of coinage.

As I have said, most all Europe has demonetized silver. Germany has $75,000,000 of it to drop somewhere; France is preparing for the monometallic experiment, and this bill under the guise of putting silver on an equality with gold is but an invitation to these nations, their miners, bullion-owners, capitalists and speculators to dump their refuse metal upon us at a premium of seventeen cents on the dollar. If it was proposed that the Government should buy all the silver that might be brought to its mints at the market price and give legal-tender dollars or silver certificates for it, I would give the measure my support, the profits would then go to the Treasury; but I will never consent that the people shall be robbed in the interest of a few men in this country or Europe who may be able to monopolize the body of the silver product. I repeat, sir, that while silver is coined under the limitations of the present law we may be able to keep a dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver at par with gold; but if we depart from these restrictions the result must inevitably be to increase silver money at the expense of a loss of all other kinds. Then, again, there will be violent fluctuations in all values and uncertainty in all business.

It is well that we let the currency laws alone until we have given them a reasonable trial. For one, I shall neither vote for this bill nor the amendment that proposes to increase the metal in the legal-tender dollar. The people want rest on this question. The ever-recurring, never-ending disposition on the part of Congress to interfere with our monetary system, our tariffs and revenue laws, is the source of constant alarm and disquiet to every industrial and business interest of the country.

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the economic situation of the country is becoming more and more hopeful, the indications of returning prosperity are unmistakable, and any legislation that tends to produce mistrust and arrest the forces that are quickening into a new life our industries and our commerce is supremest financial imbecility. The resumption act, whether wise or ill-advised, has done its work. We have reaped its harvests of hardships, and shall we sow another to be gathered by us or by posterity? The power of the resumption act to contract the currency and appreciate its value has ceased, and our whole currency has reached the coin level. Contracts of to-day and of the future, while present conditions are maintained, will not be subject to the fluctuations that either rob the creditor or bankrupt the unfortunate debtor.

But what is the extent of the real contraction that has been made in our currency during the past fourteen years? If money is a measure of values or a tool of exchange, its volume must be computed by its purchasing power. How stands the account to-day compared with our past condition? According to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, our paper circulation—and we had no other—reached its maximum on the 30th day of June, 1865. At that date the outstanding State-bank notes, national-bank notes, legal-tender Treasury notes, one and two year notes of 1873, compound-interest notes, and fractional currency amounted to the sum of $983,318,686. The gold value of these notes was $692,256,355. On June 30, 1878—and after the contraction of legal-tenders had ceased—the aggregate of these securities outstanding was $688,597,275, of the gold value of $684,465,691, showing a reduction of power in exchange of less than $8,000,000. True, I estimate paper money only, for fourteen years ago our currency had so depreciated that coin was banished from the channels of commerce and had gone abroad or taken refuge in bank-vaults or the gold-room. It was no longer a measure of values, but the tool of the coin-broker and the gold-gambler. To-day coin has its normal money use, and to show the true amount of currency on hand it should be added to the exhibit. Then the showing in round numbers on January 1, 1879, is as follows:

Greenbacks	$347,000,000
National-bank notes	324,000,000
Coin in the Treasury and in the country	358,400,000
Total	1,029,400,000

This is an increase of $46,000,000 over even the nominal value of the currency volume of 1865, and $337,000,000 above its coin value. I do not include certain bonds which are claimed to have gone into the circulation between 1864 and 1870, first, because there is evidence that they did not circulate to any considerable extent as money; and, secondly, if they did, the United States bonds of to-day are equal to them in amount and can be as conveniently put into circulation. This comparison, Mr. Speaker, between the amount of our currency to-day and that of its greatest expansion ought to satisfy the most incredulous that there need be no apprehension that our money supply will not be equal to the demands of legitimate enterprise. Sir, our currency is equal to that of Great Britain. The total specie and paper of that kingdom in circulation and in its banks in 1876 was £198,766,000, equivalent to $964,015,000. In the same year the paper money of France was but $472,400,000. To-day its paper and coin volume does not greatly exceed ours. It is true that its per capita is greater than ours, but to-day our per capita of paper money is 100 per cent. more than it was at any time between 1811 and 1861, a period of fifty years, save only in those years of collapse and disaster, 1837 and 1857.

Commercial panics in this country have always come to us when the paper volume was at flood-tide. From 1820 to 1834 the average per capita of this circulation was about $7, but in 1836 it went up to $10.74, 50 per cent., and then there was suspension and universal bankruptcy. In that year of prosperity, 1860, it was but $6.59, and the fearful panic of 1873 struck us when it was $17.75. I could multiply these coincidents but I need not do so. Their logic is that business prosperity depends much less upon the quantity of a people's money than upon its stability. The liability to fluctuate in purchasing power renders any volume of money unsafe. These brief comparisons satisfy me that we should not now adopt monetary measures of doubtful expediency, or seek to expand our currency by putting out either depreciated coin or paper. For one, at least, I am not willing to take the hazard.

THE FRENCH AND THEIR FINANCES.

The champions of irredeemable paper frequently call our attention to the financial policy of the French people during and subsequent to the Franco-Prussian war, and contrast it with ours to our discredit.

My distinguished colleague, Mr. DE LA MATYR, made eloquent allusion to it in his speech the other day. He said:

France, after her disastrous war with Germany, notwithstanding the smallness of her territory and poverty of natural resources, by the wisdom of her statesmanship inspired to intense activity her industrial forces, and kept every muscle, wheel, spindle, hammer, and plow in motion, and in less than three years fully repaired the wastes of the war and paid the enormous indemnity, and did not impoverish her people. The statesmen of France performed a far more difficult task than was committed to our statesmen at the close of our war.

After a patient search I confess, sir, I find nothing in the history of French finances but that rebuke the theories of the gentleman and his colaborers. His system—the fiat system—had neither germ nor growth in the present French Republic. The French nation never issued a dollar in paper money. It never authorized the making of a paper dollar without accompanying it with a promise that it should be redeemed in coin. When in the midst of war the Bank of France was empowered to issue its notes it was distinctly understood that these notes were to be paid in coin so soon as the nation could repay the bank what it had forced the bank to advance for war purposes. True there was a short period during which there was no legal obligation to redeem these notes in specie, but practically there never was a suspension of coin payments, for the certainty of ultimate redemption and the fact that they were a full legal tender kept them all the while at par. France may have been poor in "natural resources," doubtless was so, but in gold and silver her people were rich, for at all times—even during the war—the coin reserve in the bank and the country greatly exceeded the volume of outstanding notes. The whole paper issue was made by the Bank of France. Certainly my friend will not indorse a national banking system, and yet that was the French system.

And then that republic never had an excessive paper issue. The maximum of the notes of the Bank of France was reached on October 30, 1873, and amounted to but the sum of $614,200,000, or $370,000,000 less than our paper volume of 1865. Indeed, sir, when at flood-tide the whole volume of French paper was less by $57,000,000 than ours is to-day. But more than all this, as soon as the war was at an end the French inaugurated a forced contraction so violent that in less than two years the circulation of bank-notes was diminished $141,800,000, and bank discounts were reduced by $88,546,933 more, making a total contraction of over $230,000,000. No such cruel contraction in our greenback money ever occurred under even the most rigorous resumption policy. While the paper money was being withdrawn the coin reserve of the French was increased by $182,000,000, to make resumption sure. Resumption did occur, as previously promised, on the 1st day of January, 1878, and to attain it French economists and statesmen regarded the contraction of legal-tender paper and the accumulation of an increased coin reserve indispensable precedent conditions. Now, in what essential respect does the resumption policy of the United States differ from that adopted by France?

Wild and speculative monetary theories get no sympathy from French statesmen or financiers. Their people tried irredeemable paper—paper founded on confiscated estates and on all the wealth of the people—once, and they got enough of it. In 1790 Mirabeau "inspired to intense activity the industrial forces of the people" by issuing paper assignats to the sum of $9,115,600,000, or a sum equal to $344 per capita. It had fiat written on its front, rear, and flanks. It was a crime to refuse to take this money or to defame it. The wheels and hammers and plows would not go, the bubble burst, and this immense pile of irredeemable rubbish turned to dust in the hands of the people. It will doubtless be some time before France tries the inflation experiment again.

And France is no longer really bimetallic, for standing in the midst of the gold nations she found her gold coins and bullion steadily flowing out, and to counteract this and to keep it at home she has resolved to suspend silver coinage for seven years. In her anxiety to retain gold she restricts her coinage of silver. Shall we accept her teachings and experience and follow her example? If so, we will not pass this bill. But the grand achievement of the statesmen of France, if I understand my colleague, was in repairing the wastes of war and paying the enormous war indemnity without impoverishing the people. True the war indemnity of $1,000,000,000 was promptly paid Germany, and paid in coin. How this extraordinary financial feat was accomplished my colleague did not inform the House. The operation was a very simple one, and the explanation is easy. France put her interest-bearing bonds upon the market, sold them, took the proceeds, and discharged her obligations. That was all there was of it.

It will occur to many misguided people that the United States is engaged this very day in raising money for the payment of our debt by the same process. The difference is that France pays 5 per cent. interest and we pay but four. My colleague has unconsciously, I fear, pronounced a panegyric on John Sherman and the republican funding act. The French people have not been impoverished! Is it a difficult financial operation for a nation to sell bonds that remain unpaid without impoverishing its people? If it is impoverishing to issue bonds what will happen when they are to be paid? I have never thought that it taxed a people's resources to any alarming extent to leave a debt unpaid.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. BROWNE. With pleasure.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. Did not the French people themselves pay the debt through the government? They did not borrow it of foreigners. The people paid it and did not impoverish themselves.

Mr. BROWNE. Yes, sir; the French people, with a patriotism almost without parallel, went to the rescue of the government and took its bonds and advanced their money. And had it not been for this persistent, constant attack upon the nation's credit, this eternal effort to demoralize our currency system, the people of the United States would have taken every dollar of the debt of the United States. [Applause.] I say to my colleague further that now the people of the United States are taking our bonds as rapidly as they can be put over the counter at 4 per cent., and that—if he will pardon me the expression—if he will leave his heresies out of our politics, the day is not far distant when we will owe our own debt to our own people.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana what party it is which has tinkered with the currency of the country; what party passed the act of March 18, 1869, to strengthen the public credit; what party passed the resumption act; what party passed every act which has taken effect on the subject of finance since the war?

Mr. REED. The republican party. We were not divided at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the republican party has tinkered with the currency.

Mr. BROWNE. Another grievous mistake has been committed. France has not fully repaired the "waste of war." She has but added that waste to her national debt, and is engaged in repairing it at an annual interest rate exceeding ours.

The war between France and Germany was of about seven months' duration; the rebellion dragged through four weary, wasteful years, and yet, sir, the national debt of the French people is to-day two and one-quarter times greater than ours. They owe $4,695,600,000, while our debt is but a little more than $2,000,000,000. Ten years before our civil conflict the total value of the resources of our Government and people, as shown by the census, was but little more than $7,000,000,000; and although the rebellion cost us $4,000,000,000, in addition to the immense destruction of property it entailed, we owe to-day but $2,000,000,000, and our wealth has more than doubled since 1860. Since the war closed we have paid nearly $800,000,000 of our interest-bearing debt. We have been steadily repairing the waste of that stupendous desolation. I deny the superiority of French over American statesmanship. Our whole financial policy, with all its mistakes, will compare most favorably with that of any nation on the globe.

We have brought our paper money up from thirty-seven cents on the dollar to par without disastrously contracting its volume; we have so inspired confidence in the nation's ability to pay and its integrity of purpose that our credits have appreciated 100 per cent. While we have been reducing our debt France, England, Spain, Italy, Russia, Turkey, and in fact almost all the civilized nations in the world have been increasing theirs. We are rapidly refunding our interest-bearing obligations in securities at a lower rate, and have on this account alone made a saving equal to $11,000,000 per annum, in the last six months. We have so admirably adjusted our revenue system that the duties on spirits and tobacco alone discharge our whole annual interest. Our public securities bearing the low rate of 4 per cent. are being sold without a parallel at par. France, that model of governments, whose condition has commanded so much of rhetoric, pays 5 per cent. British consols bear but 3 per cent., it is true, but they have fallen as low as forty-seven and one-half cents in the money markets of the world, and have touched par in but four out of eighty-eight years. I have endeavored to answer rhetoric with logic, not with a sneer, and I pass the "French system" to address myself briefly to another subject.

RESUMPTION.

Mr. Speaker, both of the old parties—I do not charge it upon the nationals—have in the past been persistent in declaring it to be the duty of the Government to resume specie payments so soon as it could be done without detriment to the business interests of the country. Resumption has come. I do not seek to disguise the fact that I was an implacable foe to forced resumption and the resumption act. I followed my convictions in that opposition and I have no apology to offer. I believed then as I believe now, that resumption would come when by our increased resources we had replaced to a large extent the loss and destruction of the war. I saw with pride our currency and credits advancing with the steady swell of business and commerce and looked forward hopefully to the day when we could resume payments without panic or disaster to the people.

No word or vote of mine contributed to keeping that law in our statutes. Two years ago I would have repealed the resumption act because it proposed to convert the whole body of our indebtedness, public and private, into gold obligations in utter defiance of the law under which much of it was created giving the debtor the option of paying in silver. I would have repealed it because it contemplated a most serious and disastrous contraction of our currency, and for the reason that I regarded the fixing of an arbitrary day for resumption a blunder. But, sir, the Forty-fifth Congress, by providing for the recoinage of silver and stopping further contraction, eliminated from the resumption policy what I thought to be its dangerous features. Laws of trade, of industry, and economy—laws more potent than statutes of Congress—have done the rest, and resumption is here to stay, unless we commit some unpardonable folly.

How has resumption been reached? To what is it due? If it depended upon a mere statute I should doubt its certainty. Look at our trade balance during the last three years; examine the statistics of our coin increase, our largely increased exports, and our diminished imports. We have, in my opinion, actually grown up to resumption, not because of laws of Congress, but to some extent in defiance of them. We are selling much, buying but little, and have turned the tides and channels of wealth toward our shores. For ten years prior to 1873 we bought more from foreign countries than we sold them by from $39,000,000 to $182,000,000 a year. We have reversed these conditions, increased our exports of domestic products, and for years the trade balance has been largely in our favor. As the volume of our exports and our trade balance has been increased, in the same ratio have our credits and currency appreciated, and the day of real resumption brought near. To illustrate I will contrast two epochs—that when we were farthest from resumption with that hrough the processes of which it was reached. The first extends from 1861 to 1865, and the other from 1874 to 1878, inclusive.

The total value of our domestic exports from 1861 to 1865, inclusive, was as follows:

1862	179, 644, 624
1863	186, 003, 912
1864	143, 504, 027
1865	136, 940, 248
Total	850, 991, 827

From 1874 to 1878 the value of our domestic exports was:

1874	$569, 433, 421
1875	499, 284, 100
1876	525, 582, 247
1877	589, 670, 224
1878	680, 709, 268
Total	2, 864, 679, 260

This shows an increase of exports in the second period over the first of $2,013,687,533. This is without a parallel in all our past experience. To show you how extraordinary the increase of these exports was during the ten years ending in 1878, permit me to read from the report on foreign commerce:

Values of the principal commodities of domestic production, the exportation of which greatly increased from June 30, 1868, to June 30, 1878.

Our exports of breadstuffs in 1878 were of the value of $182,000,000 and of petroleum $46,500,000. While our exports were thus increasing our imports were diminishing. In 1873 we bought abroad $624,689,727, and in 1878 only $422,895,034, a falling off of over $201,000,000, or 33 per cent. But our trade balance in these eras show a still more gratifying improvement. From 1861 to 1865 it was against us, for we bought more than we sold by $269,696,840. Compare this with the last three and a half years, and how flattering the change! During the fiscal years of 1876, 1877, and up to December 30, 1878, we sold more than we bought by the sum of $638,505,424. The difference in these balances is nearly $1,000,000,000 in our favor.

Again, during the war years and for some time afterward, our exports of gold and silver coin and bullion exceeded our imports of these metals by many millions each year. In 1868 this excess reached nearly $80,000,000, but in 1878 it fell to less than $4,000,000. Now, sir, let us look at the effect of this increase of our commerce upon the currency. Just as our exports and trade balances have increased our currency advanced toward a coin par. Gold averaged in greenbacks during the year 1864 $2.03; in 1875 it went down to $1.15, in 1876 to $1.11, in 1877 to $1.04, and in 1878 to $1.01½, and finally, in December of that year, gold and greenbacks met on a common level. The facts I have given convince me that resumption has been reached on a sure basis, that it has been attained by an enlarged commerce and wise economies, and that it would be good statesmanship to let our financial legislation alone. [Applause.]

I now yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORTON.]

The SPEAKER. On a recent occasion the Chair decided upon an expressed opinion of the House that a member had no right to "farm out" to other members portions of his time. The Chair would state that such course is absolutely an injustice to those gentlemen whose names are on the list to allow one member to address the House a portion of the hour and then select members whose names are not upon the list and yield to them.

Mr. BROWNE. I did not intend to depart at all from the rules of the House, but I supposed that I had a right to yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. In this case the gentleman from New York, to whom the gentleman from Indiana desired to yield, was on the list, but he was not here when his name was reached.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to ask whether the ruling of the Chair would prevent one member of a committee from yielding to another member of the committee when discussing the same subject?

The SPEAKER. The members of a committee reporting a bill have a right to the preference. The Chair thinks that that preference, under the disposition manifested by the House, should be confined to the time occupied by the member himself, or they might otherwise take up the whole time allowed for the discussion of a bill, and exclude from participation in debate those who are perhaps as much interested in the subject as the members of the committee, and who may not have an opportunity of inducing a member of the committee to give them the time they desired.

Now, the Chair thinks that the practice is right, because the responsibility of the disposition of the floor should be in the Chair, and not in members on the floor of the House.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Suppose a gentleman on a committee does not desire to speak.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has refused that in this instance. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALTER A. WOOD] desired to give his time to another member, and the Chair refused to allow such transfer under what he understood to be the instruction of the House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not believe that the House intended to instruct the Speaker to decide that the gentleman having an hour might not give five or ten minutes of his time to another member. I think it tends to encourage discussion and gives more members an opportunity to express their views, and, with all due deference to the Speaker, I should be glad if the Speaker would at some proper time submit that question to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows the rule works great discontent in the House to members here. A member entitled to the floor for one hour yields it to the exclusion of the member next on the list. The Chair thinks that if a gentleman wants ten minutes he should have a right to have it, but that a member ought not to have the right to give to another fifty minutes; that surely was not the purpose of the rule.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. As it is now, the discussion on every important bill is confined to fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five members; whereas if the gentleman from Indiana had the right to yield ten minutes to one member, and five minutes to another, gentlemen who do not desire to make long speeches will then get themselves on the record.

The SPEAKER. What is the difference whether the member gets that time from a member or from the Chair? The duty of assigning the floor properly belongs to the Chair. The Chair can give five minutes as well as any member can give it.

The gentleman from Indiana who has just spoken spoke forty minutes, and the gentleman who follows him may want only five minutes, and then the Chair passes to the next on the list.

Mr. REED. It is just to that point I want to speak. Under the rule the Chair encourages hour speeches, and the inflexible rule of having a list encourages the publication of essays and prevents debate on subjects like this, and makes it almost impossible to get a debate or for a gentleman to get a chance to speak when he feels like it. He goes up and he finds a list there at the Speaker's desk, and he may be put off two or three days and the points upon which he desired to speak may have passed from the attention of the House. I think it will conduce to freedom of debate if some different rule were adopted by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman certainly has no hardship to complain of. He spoke on Saturday although he was not in that position on the list.

Mr. REED. I make no complaint against this rule of the House for it never gave me any more trouble than it does others. I got an opportunity on Saturday, unexpectedly to myself, on account of another member being in the chair who did not enforce the rule as the Speaker did, and for that I was very grateful.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the recognition of the right of members is in the Speaker.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. When a member does not wish to occupy his whole hour he might yield ten or twenty minutes to some other member.

The SPEAKER. The next member on the list is entitled to be recognized, and yielding practically takes away from the Chair the assignment of the floor.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, and that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "bullion" in line 4, section 3, page 3, insert the following words: "produced from the mines of the United States;" so that the section will read: "Any owner of silver bullion produced from the mines in the United States may deposit the same at any mint," &c.

RECESS.

Mr. WARNER. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening; the evening session to be for debate only.

Mr. HAWLEY. Pending the motion for a recess, I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WARNER. I hope there will be no objection to a recess.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will not compel me to go on to-night.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting estimates for deficiencies in the appropriations for the General Land Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DR. WILLIAM A. HAMMOND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting draught of an act to amend an act for the relief of William A. Hammond; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ILLICIT DISTILLATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, setting forth in detail the operations of that bureau in the suppression of illicit distillation; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FISHER, for ten days, on account of important business;

To Mr. KEIFER, indefinitely, on account of important business; and

To Mr. COLERICK, indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of his mother.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Unanimous consent was given for the withdrawal of papers as follows:

To Mr. HENKLE, in the case of Mrs. Julia Watkins; no adverse report.

COMMODORE J. W. A. NICHOLS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 70) authorizing Commodore J. W. A. Nichols, United States Navy, to accept from His Catholic Majesty, the King of Spain, the grand cross of naval merit; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. I now insist upon my motion that the House take a recess until eight o'clock this evening, the session of to-night to be for debate only on the silver bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 46, noes 48.

Mr. HAWLEY. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum to determine a motion to adjourn; but the Chair will appoint tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.]

Mr. FORT. If there are any gentlemen who desire to speak to-night, I have no objection to a night session; but if there are not, then I think it is exceedingly unfair upon the part of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to try to crowd me into the night session.

Mr. FRYE. There is no quorum here, and the gentleman cannot get a recess to-night.

Mr. WARNER. We can try it.

The House again divided upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr HAWLEY, (one of the tellers.) There is a difference in the count by the tellers in regard to the negative vote. We agree upon the affirmative vote that it is 52; I make the negative vote 52, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] makes the negative vote 53.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will settle the question by voting in the negative, making the vote 52 to 53; and the motion to adjourn is not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary upon a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I know that, but it will require a quorum to take a recess.

Mr. WARNER. I will withdraw the motion for a recess.

The SPEAKER. The motion for a recess being withdrawn, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] as entitled to the floor, and he will now proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] is not ready to proceed, there are plenty of other names on the list.

Mr. FORT. I see very plainly and with great regret that the gentleman who reported this bill [Mr. WARNER] is not willing that I should have an opportunity to speak upon it, because I have not pledged myself to vote for every single word and sentence in the bill. I see also, to my further regret, that some of those who have been coquetting with him have also joined in the effort to keep me from speaking on this subject.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] does not wish to speak at this time, I will move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to say a word in this connection. I was not aware that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] intended to speak to-night until he took the floor.

Mr. FORT. I was assigned the floor, and I objected to a recess and told the gentleman why I objected.

Mr. WARNER. I was certainly not aware that the gentleman was entitled to the floor.

Mr. KENNA. As I understand it, the request for a session to-night was not intended to affect the gentleman who now has the floor or to affect any other gentleman who may be entitled to the floor. The request was made by the gentleman in charge of this bill in order to give a number of us whose names are not on the list an opportunity to speak this evening, because it is probable we will have no other opportunity to speak upon this bill. I, for one, desire to be heard in favor of it.

Mr. FORT. I said that I had no objection to that.

Mr. KENNA. That was my motive, and I think it was the motive of others who favored a night session.

Mr. FORT. I requested the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] not to force me to go on to-night.

Mr. WARNER. I beg to correct the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. I insist upon my motion to adjourn.

Mr. WARNER. I give notice that to-morrow, at three o'clock, I shall move to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] having withdrawn the motion for a recess so that the House could proceed with the subject before it, that is, intervening business, the motion to adjourn is now in order.

Mr. KENNA. I renew the motion for a recess instead of adjourning, so as to have a night session.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence of the motion for a recess.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to suggest, in order to solve this difficulty, that there be a session to-night, and any gentleman who desires to speak upon this bill can come here to-night and do so; and that unanimous consent be given that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] be first recognized to-morrow morning as entitled to the floor upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit to the House the suggestion that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] has made, that a recess be now taken till this evening at eight o'clock, when gentlemen who may desire to do so shall speak, but that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] who now has the floor, shall be recognized in his own right to-morrow morning.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. This is not to affect the list of speakers as already arranged.

Mr. FRYE. But, Mr. Speaker, I objected with a purpose, a design. I prefer that the discussion on this bill shall go on for the next week or ten days. I think it safer to have the House occupied with this harmless discussion than with a great many other things that might come up. Therefore, I shall object to the proposition just stated by the Chair.

Mr. KENNA. I would like to say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that a number of us desire to submit remarks on this bill, but in the same connection I say to him frankly that that number, so far as the democratic side of the House is concerned, do not propose by any means to be led into the postponement in any way of final action by the House on this bill. If the republican side are determined to protract this debate with a view to kill this bill, they shall have no help from me, for one at least.

Mr. FRYE. Then, Mr. Speaker, they cannot want to speak a great deal.

Mr. KENNA. We do not want to make speeches so much as we want action on this bill, and those of us who desired to speak to-night will do nothing to delay its passage for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels it due to himself to say that he voted a moment ago against adjournment for the accommodation of members, certainly not for his own accommodation

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CONGER, that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 54, noes 42; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of M. C. Spaulding, of Maine, praying that an inquiry be made touching the enforcement of the law prohibiting the transmission through the mails of lottery tickets and letters relating thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Arthur P. Bagby, of Texas, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of H. E. Kickler, of Pekin, Illinois, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the refunding to him of $481.60, being the amount of tax-paid stamps destroyed by fire in the warehouse of the City Distilling Company of that city on the 28th of November, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of James Preston, late private in Company I, Twenty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying for the passage of a law granting him a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of John C. Tilton and E. E. Stimpson, of Haverhill, Massachusetts, owners of the steamer City of Fredricton, praying for the passage of a law giving to them the use of their steamer which has been seized by the custom-house officers under the law of 1793. I desire to state that the petition is printed including the signature. I do not wish to commit myself or the Senate to the propriety of that proceeding. I present it and move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to introduce a bill to amend an act for the relief of Joseph B. Collins, approved March 3, 1879; and I ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The bill (S. No. 595) to amend an act for the relief of Joseph B. Collins, approved March 3, 1879, was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the second time by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to inquire of the Chair in a parliamentary way whether, when a bill is read in this way, it is still in time to object to its being introduced without leave and without a day's notice. The ordinary method of doing the business of the Senate under the rules used to be that a Senator asked unanimous consent, as the rules now are, and the Chair stated it in that way, and we knew what the title of the bill was before the unanimous consent was granted. We have now run down into the practice, which saves time, of not going through with that form. I now rise to inquire whether I am in time to object to the present introduction of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has followed the practice, and does not remember that it has been departed from; but that it was adopted for the purpose of economizing time ought not to deprive the Senator, in the opinion of the Chair, of the right to object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had no doubt that was so; but I should like to have the title of the bill read again.

The bill was read the second time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I shall not object to that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. LOGAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 596) providing for the permanent improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, and for the reclamation of the low lands of the States bordering thereon, and for hygienic purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 597) for the relief of Rev. Erastus Lathrop, of the State of Illinois; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 598) for the relief of Edward L. Wilson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. VEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 599) for the judicial investigation and adjustment of private land claims in the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Florida, and the States of Alabama and Mississippi south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 600) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 601) authorizing the allowance for loss by leakage or casualty of spirits withdrawn from distillery warehouses for exportation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the bill and petition for relief of Francis S. Davidson be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LANDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no resolutions to be offered, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST;] which will be reported.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, if not incompatible with the public interest, the President be requested to inform the Senate if any lands in the Indian Territory were purchased from Indian tribes in such Territory by the treaties of 1866, and, if so, how many acres; and whether the United States has parted with its title to any portion of such lands. And that the President be further requested to inform the Senate if any portion of such lands were purchased for the purpose of locating Indians and freedmen thereon; and whether any of such lands are at this date unoccupied by Indian tribes or freedmen, and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to use such unoccupied lands for the settlement of Indians and freedmen; and, if the Government has such intention, what Indians and freedmen are to be located on such lands.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I only wish to make a single remark in regard to the resolution. Recent events have demonstrated that in the very near future some legislation will be necessary in regard to the Indian Territory. At present that Territory stands like a huge rock in the middle of the current of civilization and emigration to the Southwest. I have no disposition to forestall what may be the judgment and action of Congress in regard to this very important matter. I simply wish to say now that, in obedience to the instructions of my State Legislature and in obedience to my own opinions, I propose at an early day to introduce a bill for the organization of that Territory into a State government and its admission into the Union; and in order that all the surroundings, all the facts, in regard to this matter may be well known to Congress and to the public, I have introduced this resolution.

If that Territory is to be made a Botany Bay by the United States for the vicious and dangerous Indians of the plains, we ought to know it in the Southwestern States. If it is to become a portion of a great nation given to a future of glory and greatness, it is time now that preliminary steps should be taken in that direction.

I hope in any event, whatever may be the opinions of Senators, that this resolution at least may be adopted, in order that a full and complete knowledge and understanding may be had of all the surroundings of this question. I ask the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask leave to present and have read and printed in the RECORD a communication from the Postmaster-General, addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in respect to additional clerks in the Post-Office Department, and I give notice that after the letter is read I shall move to amend the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill in regard to the points mentioned in the letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1879.

Hon. S. B. MAXEY,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

I have the honor to recommend that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be amended so as to allow to the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General eight clerks of class 4, twenty-eight clerks of class 3, and fourteen of class 2, instead of the numbers now provided for. This increase is very much needed, in consequence of the large increase of new mail-routes largely increasing the work of that office.

Very respectfully,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. MAXEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN S. SAUNDERS.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar Senate bill No. 141.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 141.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (S. No. 141) for the removal of the political disabilities of John S. Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. My only objection, for this apparently is a correct case as I remember its consideration in the committee, is that it is one of the numerous steps that we are taking, every day it is true, in the course of general legislation at this session. I do not know that it is possible to call a halt anywhere, and certainly I am not disposed to call a halt against this particular person; but at the same time we have got to decide, probably about October, whether we are going on with the universality of general legislation or not. If that is once decided upon, I have myself a large number of very useful bills I shall be glad to introduce and have considered and passed; but I shall not ask any division of the Senate on this particular question.

Mr. WHYTE. I want to say to my friend from Vermont that this bill came in at the last session, but owing to some delay at the War Department it was not reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will call it an exception, then.

The motion of Mr. WHYTE was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed; two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

CONSPIRACIES AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 1577) to amend section 5440 of the Revised Statutes may be put on its passage. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Chair would put the question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like the Senator having charge of the bill to explain what it is.

Mr. LAMAR. The explanation is very brief and simple. The existing law, which is proposed to be amended, provides that if two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of the parties do any act to affect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000. The object of this amendment is to strike out the minimum of $1,000, leaving the punishment to the discretion of the court, so that it shall not exceed $10,000. There is one other change. This amendment authorizes the court to impose a fine alone, or imprisonment without fine, or both, whereas the statute as it now stands makes it imperative upon the court in case of conviction to inflict both an imprisonment and a fine. There is no change in the description of the offense, nor as to the proceeding, or the evidence. Instead of making it obligatory upon the court to inflict both fine and imprisonment, (the former to be not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000,) the amendment makes it discretionary in the court to inflict either, or both, so that the one shall not exceed $10,000 or the other two years. The amendment is deemed to be needful in order to enable the court to adapt the punishment to the measure of the offense described in the statutes, many of which are small and trivial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall vote against proceeding to the consideration of the bill upon the ground that I suggested when the little disability bill was up, not that I do not think the bill is right (I believe on an investigation in the Judiciary Committee we all thought the bill was right) but upon the ground that it falls into the general class in respect of which no special exceptional features can be stated of going on with the universality of legislation at this time. For that reason I shall vote against taking it up, although it will not do any good I know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It amends section 5440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of America so as to read:

If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $10,000, or to imprisonment for not more than two years, or to both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. If there is no further morning business, I ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business the Chair will declare the morning hour at an end; and the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. BECK. The last amendment acted upon was on page 76, line 1869, reducing the appropriation for pay of the chief of the division of inspection and equipment in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General from $2,250 to $2,000; and the next amendment is, in line 1875, changing the total of the item.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1875, to reduce the total amount of the appropriations for the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General from $101,790 to $101,540.

Mr. MAXEY. In line 1869, I move that the word "seven," before "clerks," be stricken out and "eight" inserted; in line 1871, that the word "twenty-seven," before "clerks," be stricken out and "twenty-eight" inserted; and in line 1872, that the word "thirteen," before "clerks," be stricken out and "fourteen" inserted. The reasons for this increase of clerks in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General are so clearly set forth in the communication of the Postmaster-General that I think no one will object to it. I ask that the communication be read.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Texas will let us proceed as we have been doing until we get through with the amendments of the committee, and then we can go back to this item.

Mr. MAXEY. I thought it was in order to move an amendment to the amendments of the committee.

Mr. BECK. This is not in order at this time, according to the understanding.

Mr. MAXEY. Was not that the understanding?

Mr. BECK. No, but that the amendments of the committee should first be acted on.

Mr. MAXEY. I will let the committee proceed in their own way, but I thought it was exactly in accordance with the ruling of the Chair that an amendment could be offered to an amendment of the committee when it was reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment of the committee? The Chair hears none, and it is adopted.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of Agriculture," after the word "purchased," in line 2006, to strike out the words "and to whom distributed, and in what quantities; a reasonable and equal proportion of which seeds shall be supplied for distribution among their agricultural constituency to Members and Delegates of Congress when requested," and in lieu thereof to insert "a proper proportion of which seeds shall, if requested, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of Congress, for distribution among their constituency;" so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase and propagation, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, $70,000; for parceling, packing, and distributing the same, $30,000: Provided further, That the Commissioner shall be required, and is hereby instructed, to accompany his next annual estimate of the expenses of the Department of Agriculture with an itemized report of the quantity of seeds and plants purchased during the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made, the date of said purchases, the prices paid, and from whom said seeds and plants were purchased, a proper proportion of which seeds shall, if requested, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of Congress, for distribution among their constituency: Provided, No part of said sum shall be paid to salaried employés in said Department.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to this amendment so far as it modifies the original bill, but I do object to the whole provision for giving seeds to members of Congress for distribution. It is an unmitigated nuisance. The distribution cannot be fair or equal. The amount that is necessarily supplied to each member is too limited to reach any considerable portion of his constituents, and it brings us innumerable letters applying for seeds which we have no power to give. I wish the committee would agree to strike out the whole provision.

Mr. BECK. We endeavored to modify the provision of the House and bring it down as much as we could. The Senator will observe that only a proper proportion of the seeds is to be supplied to members of Congress. We did not want to prevent any Senator who might differ with the Senator from Rhode Island and myself (for I agree with him about the nuisance of the system) from being entitled to have seeds sent to him at his request. We thought as the House provision was so broad that we ought to limit it and bring it down as much as possible without striking it out altogether. There has been complaint sometimes made by members of Congress that they have been refused seeds when they applied for them, and we thought perhaps it was reasonable to leave the provision in this limited form so that if members did see fit to apply for seeds the Commissioner would feel at liberty to comply with their request.

Mr. ANTHONY. The right to apply for the seeds implies the obligation to apply if we are requested to do so by our constituents. It seems to me that one of the best reforms which the present Commissioner of Agriculture has instituted has been the abandonment of the distribution of seeds by members of Congress. He always responds to a demand for seeds from practical farmers who will make a report of their cultivation, which will be of some use to the agriculture of the country. I wish the committee would agree to strike out the whole provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would not be in order I suppose now to move to strike out the whole provision. If so, I should make that motion.

Mr. BECK. I really do not think the committee care much about it. We were endeavoring to approach what the Senator desires, and so modified the provision that perhaps in conference the two Houses together may either remove any objection to it or dispose of it altogether. Our object was to bring the system down to a very small matter and to prevent any annoyance that might exist. The House inserted the clause, and we so far changed it as to leave it open to conference.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Kentucky who has charge of the bill will give me his assent to it, I will move to strike out the whole provision.

Mr. BECK. I can only say that I feel compelled to vote to sustain the action of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If we strike out the provision, how will the law then stand?

Mr. BECK. The result would be to leave the whole matter under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that I receive a great many letters requesting seeds to be sent, and I always forward the letters to the Commissioner of Agriculture with the indorsement that the applicant is a farmer and a responsible and respectable man; and the Commissioner always sends the seeds; and that seems the most convenient possible method of distributing them.

Mr. BECK. I have no wish about the matter. It is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the House had not made a different provision I should not have asked that a change take place, but the House made a provision on this subject, and one, as the Committee on Appropriations believed, that would act improperly, because the seeds would go as well to members of Congress from the cities where probably they would never be wanted. The amendment, Senators will observe, provides that a proper proportion of the seeds, if a Senator or Member so requests, shall be sent to the Senator or Member. That is, if a Senator requests it he gets his proper proportion, whatever that proper proportion may be; and if he does not make the request, then the seeds will not be sent to him; but the Commissioner under this provision can do just as he is doing now. When the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS]—and I join with him in this as I have done so often—or any other Senator receives a letter requesting seeds he incloses it to the Commissioner and the Commissioner supplies them. This provision is intended to allow the Commissioner still to do so; it does not prohibit that as the Committee on Appropriations has amended it; but as it came from the House that probably could not have been done, because the Commissioner was required to distribute equally among all the members, whether they wanted the seeds or not, and he would have to keep an account of what he sent to each member of Congress. That would have been very troublesome, and it would cost probably more than the seeds to be sent are worth to have kept an account with each individual. The Senate committee believe that the provision as they recommend it is much the best.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, would it not be far better to have a fair distribution among Senators and members of the House instead of having to refer the letters which we receive applying for seeds to the Commissioner of Agriculture? I can state my experience to the Senator from West Virginia. I have had frequent applications of late, when the course pursued by the Commissioner has been to absorb this matter and distribute the seeds himself. My experience has been that of the letters I have thus sent only in the case of one in half a dozen or only semi-occasionally has the Commissioner responded favorably to the letters that have been referred to him asking for the distribution of seeds. Now, I think it would be far better to have these seeds lodged with the members of the House and Senate so that they can be distributed in their several districts and States more equitably and more satisfactorily than will be done if the distribution is left to the head of the Agricultural Bureau.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator from Michigan reads the amendment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, he will notice that it leaves the method of distribution discretionary with each individual member of Congress. If the Senator from Michigan at the beginning of a session wishes the proper proportion of the seeds to which he is entitled to be sent to him, he has a right to ask for them. If, on the other hand, he desires to let them remain in the Department, as the Senators from Kentucky and other Senators prefer, so as to have them distributed when requested by letter, he can do so. The provision of the committee is intended to leave it broad enough for the Member or Senator to request the seeds to be sent to himself or to have them sent to his constituents from the Department.

Mr. FERRY. Yes; but if the discretion is left to the Commissioner of Agriculture you will find, as that has been my experience, that when you want seeds some other part of the country has received so largely that there is none for your particular State or district. As I said, if it is left to the Commissioner that will be the result. At least that has been my experience, and I find that others have had similar experience. A great deal of complaint has been lodged at the door of the Commissioner of Agriculture. I do not know that he is directly to blame, but at any rate the administration of that Department has not been satisfactory in that respect. Such has been my experience, and therefore I am glad of the opportunity here on the floor of the Senate to state that my requests, for instance, for the last year have been very seldom granted as compared with preceding years. It had been the practice to send to the Senator or to the Representative a quantity of seeds, and certainly it is not very laborious to make the distribution in that way. A member or a Senator knows better who is entitled or who would be glad to receive seeds in his district or in his State, but if it is left to the Commissioner of Agriculture those who are more persistent and active and have greater demands will absorb the surplus, and when you apply your letters will not be responded to favorably.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The remarks of the Senator from Michigan are more applicable to the present existing state of things than to the provisions of this amendment. I agree with him in a great deal that he has said, and if there were no provision in this bill on this subject it would be very much as he has described; but the Senator very well knows that there are Senators and Members from large cities who do not probably want to be bothered with seeds, and then they are distributed by the Commissioner. I think it is well to adopt this amendment as it is, and when the conference committees of the two Houses come together, if a change is needed to satisfy each, it can be made, because there is already an amendment which gives the conference control of the clause.

Mr. ANTHONY. This puts a most invidious responsibility on the Commissioner of Agriculture. "A proper proportion of which seeds shall, if requested, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of Congress." How is he to decide what is "a proper proportion," what is my proportion, and what is the proportion of the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is easy enough. There are in round numbers three hundred and fifty members of the Senate and House of Representatives. He divides the quantity he has by three hundred and fifty, and the quotient is the proper proportion of each.

Mr. ANTHONY. The distribution of seeds, like the distribution of books, is partial, invidious, and unsatisfactory, and they both ought to be abolished. As this is an amendment of the committee, I suppose it is in order (at least, it is in consonance with the understanding that the amendments of the committee should be gone through first) to amend the amendment of the committee. I move, therefore, to strike out all after the word "purchased," in line 2006, to the word "constituency," in line 2013. I move to concur with the committee in striking out, but not in inserting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The committee have no particular words they desire; they want to get the best they can. Now, if the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island is adopted, it appears to me we shall have left the bill in an unsatisfactory condition, and left it almost precisely as it is now, of which all the Senators and especially the Senator from Michigan complain, and I think probably after this discussion on this amendment of the committee, which will give the conference control over the subject, probably some proper arrangement can be arrived at which will cover the whole ground.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we concur with the amendment of the committee in striking out and non-concur with the amendment inserting we shall still leave it in the power of the committee of conference to be settled there.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It does not improve it any in our judgment. We think the amendment had better remain as it is.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island will not prevail. It makes the matter worse, in my judgment. I am against lodging the power with the head of that Department, because my experience, as I stated before, has been rather an unfavorable one. If my recollection serves me I have had but four applications directly within six months, of which three were responded to favorably and the fourth rejected. Now think of the idea of a Senator receiving letters from a constituent four times asking for a few seeds to be sent, supplied in three instances but in the fourth not.

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps he was out of seed at the time.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Colorado says he may have been out of seeds, but I found that following that other parties received seeds.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But my friend will see that the wording of the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will remedy that to some extent.

Mr. FERRY. I see the force of that. I am speaking now more directly to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island. I think if that prevails it will make the matter worse.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. FERRY. I have regretted the necessity of criticising the head of this Department, but I have felt it my duty, and I am glad of the occasion, for I think Senators, at least several within my knowledge, have not been treated as they ought to have been treated. I care nothing for myself, because it is very seldom that I apply; but when a constituent applies, and a response is made that there are no seeds here for distribution, it is strange to learn that very soon thereafter a member of Congress has been there for a neighbor of mine and has received seeds about the same time. When I see that fact I presume there is something wrong. I think the practice of having the head of this Department make the distribution, instead of giving it to the Members and Senators, who will more equitably distribute these seeds, is a vicious practice, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. TELLER. The Commissioner has plainly followed the statute as it now exists. I do not think there can be any doubt about that. If it has not worked right it is not his fault. I will say for the Commissioner that I have made personal application for seeds on two occasions and failed to get them when my constituents had written me for seeds, and in each case the Commissioner informed me he had no seeds. I thought that was a good reply. It seems to me the amendment of the committee is just exactly what it ought to be. If a Senator wants to be bothered with sending out seeds let him do it, or if he will take the chances of sending his letters to the Commissioner, let him do that.

Mr. BECK. I am not very familiar with this part of the bill; but the Senator from West Virginia, who has been connected with the Committee on Agriculture so long, is. We deferred very largely to him and we took his views in regard to it. I will only say to the Senate now that if they agree to the amendment of the committee we will endeavor—at least I will—to confer freely with the Committees on Agriculture of both Houses to see in what shape we can put the matter, believing that we have improved the House provision very greatly, and then I think when we go into conference we shall agree upon a provision satisfactory to all. We shall endeavor to do so at least if the Senate adopt the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. What is the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2006, page 82, after the word "purchased," it is proposed to strike out all down to the word "requested" in line 2010, as follows:

And to whom distributed, and in what quantities; a reasonable and equal proportion of which seeds shall be supplied for distribution among their agricultural constituency to Members and Delegates of Congress when requested.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move to amend that amendment by adding "upon application of agricultural societies," so that there shall be some well-understood method of distributing these seeds, something that will insure an intelligent distribution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Where does the Senator from Rhode Island desire his amendment to come in.

Mr. BURNSIDE. At the end of the clause.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the committee's amendment will be allowed to remain as it is.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Every good farmer, if he desires, can get seeds for experiment in the neighborhood in which he lives. He can get them through the agricultural society of the neighborhood and the Agricultural Department here will get reports of the results.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The agricultural societies are all supplied now when there are seeds to be had. If that provision is inserted, members may get none. I think it would be better to let the matter remain as the committee have proposed it. It will only complicate it further to amend it as now proposed.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The trouble is that some of the members get a great many seeds and others get none. If they are issued through agricultural societies there will be an intelligent distribution of them, and these agricultural societies will look to the matter and see that injustice is not done. The same amount of seeds distributed in that way will do a great deal more good than this indiscriminate distribution. Certainly no harm will arise from that distribution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator's amendment prevails it will give an opportunity to the Commissioner, if he thinks proper, to distribute them all to agricultural societies. Now, it is well known that some States have a number, and other States or sections of the country have but few, and in the new States especially where seed is wanted the agricultural societies are not so abundant as they are in Rhode Island, where manufactures prevail probably to a great extent. I suppose the Senator has agricultural societies in his State, but not a great many, and Rhode Island would not fare any better than some of the other States.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The few seeds I have had from the Agricultural Department I have sent to agricultural societies, and I find I get good results from them. They distribute them in a proper way. I think in all communities where proper attention is paid to agriculture agricultural societies do exist, and where they do not exist it is simply a distribution of seed to men who will not cultivate the land properly, and you do not get good returns. In other words, it is giving seeds to farmers for use as seeds, saving them the money which they would have to expend for purchasing seeds, instead of giving out seeds for the purpose of getting good results.

Mr. ANTHONY. If this distribution of seeds and plants was confined to rare plants, exotics, plants that are not produced in this country, and that the Agricultural Department desire to promote the cultivation of by having them sent to practical agriculturists who would report upon the results of their cultivation, then there would be some public benefit in the distribution. But the distribution of lettuce seed, cabbage seed, and turnip seed, seeds that you can go and buy at the seed stores for less than the cost of wrapping them up in the Department, is a nuisance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Judicial," after line 2086, to insert:

For salary of the additional associate justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, created by the act of February 25, 1879, $1,122.22 for the fiscal year 1879, and $4,000 for the fiscal year 1880.

Mr. BECK. The exact amount embraced here is fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The act creating an additional judge approved February 25, 1879, fixes the salary, so that the sums are correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed and continued the reading of the bill until he reached line 2153.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. The Senator from New York desires to debate this proposition. I would request him and request the Senate to assent that all that portion of the bill from line 2108 to line 2168, inclusive, being what is known as the political parts of the bill, be informally passed over for the present, and allow us to see if we cannot finish the rest of the bill. If, however, it is not through by half past one o'clock, I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KERNAN. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With that understanding the Senator from New York yields the floor.

The Chief Clerk resumed and continued the reading of the bill to line 2209.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to give notice that at the proper time I will offer an amendment to strike out "four" and insert "five" in line 2209.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 3, after the word "each" in line 6, to strike out:

And the words "during the session," as used in the first section of this act, shall be held to mean seven months;

So that the section will read:

SEC. 3. That the pay of assistant messengers, firemen, watchmen, and laborers appropriated for in this act, unless otherwise specially stated, shall be as follows: For assistant messengers, firemen, and watchmen, $720 per annum each; for laborers, $660 per annum each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BECK. The committee have only a few other amendments to offer, not more than two or three that we now know of, and we shall offer them as soon as the Senator from New York concludes his remarks.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, this bill making provision, among other things, for the administration of the civil and criminal laws of the United States by the Federal courts proposes by one of the sections which has been read and passed over to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes. I ask that they may be read. I will send the volumes to the desk, that the sections referred to may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The sections indicated will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 820. The following shall be causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, in addition to the causes existing by virtue of section 812, namely: Without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person whom the giver of such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or whom he had good ground to believe to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; or to have counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States.

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or venireman or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist, with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, the law embodied in those sections was enacted by Congress in the early part of the civil war which raged from 1861 to 1865. In my judgment they ought to have been repealed before this, and therefore they ought to be repealed now. I believe that section 820 was repealed in 1871, but we find it re-enacted and standing as law in the last edition of the Revised Statutes; and even if that were out of the way, section 821 is even more detrimental to the procuring of a fair, impartial, and intelligent jury in all the States that were in the rebellion than was section 820. The Supreme Court has recently decided that you cannot require a juror to disclose that he was in or gave aid and comfort to the rebellion; but section 821 does not require him to disclose anything. That is a section which says that in the discretion of any judge, be he such a one as sat in Louisiana and who made midnight orders, or whether he be one of the best in the land, the public prosecutor or his representative may move that the court put to every man summoned as a grand or petit juror, and the court in its discretion may put a searching oath which requires him not only to swear that he never joined in the rebellion, or gave aid or comfort to it, but also that he has never given the slightest aid, even to the extent of a coat to cover a man whom he believed had been in rebellion or a man that he had reason to believe was about to go into it; and the statute declares that the judge shall discharge every grand or petit juror that cannot take that oath. When we think for a moment of what we all know, that in the Southern States the great masses of the intelligent people, the people of experience, the people of property, the educated people, did either actively participate or in some way give aid to those who were going into or had come from the rebellion, we know that this is a mode of purging the jury-box of all that is impartial, of all that is intelligent, of all that has had experience to enable men to judge in reference to evidence and tell where the truth is and where that which is false. It was a scheme to purge them all out and to leave a jury in those States, in criminal proceedings and in civil proceedings, utterly unfit to aid in the administration of justice, from their want of intelligence and experience and from the prejudices they would naturally have during these years on any question that would come before them between certain parties.

Sir, it has been said by a wise man that in countries where jury trials prevail, it was one of the great objects and offices of government to have laws by which to get first an impartial, intelligent, unprejudiced grand jury, and next to get for the petit jury men who are qualified to decide contests between their fellow-men and to stand between the power of the government and the citizen who is prosecuted by its officers, unprejudiced and impartial.

Should not these laws be repealed as a part of the judicial system of the United States Government? By your Constitution "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury;" and yet you have on your statute-book here a provision that a judge, from weakness, from partiality to one side or another, from any other motive, may purge from your grand jury every man that is fit to say whether the citizen complained of should or should not, on the evidence, be tried for an infamous crime.

When you come to the petit jury in criminal cases you can hardly under these laws get a jury in those States except from a class that I always speak of kindly, but a class that are entirely destitute of the experience and intelligence that would give them good judgment, a class that in a very large number of the criminal prosecutions under these acts of Congress that bristle on the statute-book would be entirely prejudiced against one side and partial to the other, and would be likely to register the verdict which the prosecutors desired. Our Constitution says that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right of speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State or district where the alleged offense is alleged to have been committed;" yet here has stood during these thirteen or fourteen years of peace upon your statute-book, section 821, that put it in the power of the court, at the instance of the party prosecuting in criminal cases for the Government, not to challenge men for partiality, not to have the question tried whether they are fit and impartial according to the rules of the common law, but to say to each man summoned, "if you cannot swear that you never gave the slightest aid or comfort to a man who was going to engage in the rebellion or who had left it, you shall be excluded from the jury-box," and you are to take your jury from men who we know are utterly incompetent, if they were devoid of prejudice, to act fairly or justly between the parties.

Why, sir, there are men, I know some of them, living in those States who did everything they could at great risk to avert secession and to stand by the Union. Secession was accomplished against the will of many a man of that class. He never took part in the rebellion, but his son or nephew or neighbor was carried away by the excitement of the community in which he lived and went out with his State. If the son came back from the war naked and hungry and he gave him food to eat and clothes to cover his nakedness, or some stranger came back and he in charity gave him aid and comfort by clothing or food, he could not take this oath and would be driven from the jury-box.

I have alluded to this because it is in the bill and I call attention to it because in our presence on the other side of the Chamber it has been said that section 821 ought not to be repealed because it was only discretionary in the judge on the motion of the public prosecutor or his representative. Sir, wherever the veneration and the love of trial by jury and the rules that apply to it as taught us by the country from which we derived trial by jury, as taught us by our own experience, exist, there must be no discretion in any judge or any district attorney to exclude men arbitrarily from the jury-box.

Sir, this is one of the specimens of the legislation which has cursed every land where it has been put in force. Take the history of Scotland, where the minority trampled down the majority at one stage of its history by having all sorts of test oaths in reference to religious creeds in persecuting Presbyterians; but I do not know that they were ever applied there to jurors. But turn to the history of Ireland in the year 1792 and you will find a respectful memorial of representatives of all classes of the people of that country to the British government asking to be relieved from these test oaths as to their creed, which were used to exclude them from every jury, and it was a mode of getting rid of one political party and that the majority in that country, those of the ancient faith, were restive under the domination of England. They were justly dissatisfied, as every people are who are trodden down on account of creed or ostracised on account of their peculiar opinions; hence it was, as Curran said in those trials for treason at the close of the last century, that the minority of the people were dominating and using the courts to crush those who differed with them politically and were not legally guilty. He said he knew that he addressed in the jury-box deaf ears, because every man on the jury was purged out by their test-oath laws that would be impartially between the prisoners who had been charged with crime against the British government. It has left a rankling, as it would naturally, in the mind of the people of Ireland to this day.

Now, sir, I have said all I want to say about the test-oath question. I appeal to every American of every party in the North or in the South who is not blinded by partisan zeal and partisan prejudice, whether he would not at once relieve this large body of people in the Southern States from these test oaths. It is not merely in reference to grand and petit juries for criminal trials, but we are appropriating money to administer the law under the Constitution, the seventh article of the amendments of which declares:

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved.

And the man who would have such a purging oath as this applied to grand and petit jurors in reference to criminal matters and to all jurors where there are contests between men for property above the value of $20, the man who would keep this law on the statute-book, in view of what we know of the condition of the southern people, knowing whom it drives out of the jury-box and whom it keeps in, does not desire, in my judgment, to give that people justice even in the courts of the United States.

Take the class that would be brought into the jury-box by this law, (sections 820 and 821)—men who are zealous for one party and prejudiced against the other party. Their prejudices will make them give a verdict not according to the evidence but according to the prejudices which exist and excite their minds.

Mr. President, when I heard it said in the Senate that section 820 really ought to be out, as it was repealed in 1871, but that section 821 should not be repealed if it could be prevented by some of the gentlemen on the other side, I felt that they had allowed themselves to forget what they owed to themselves and to our Constitution, which says we shall have impartial juries that justice may be administered without fear or favor by honest, upright courts, which should be blind to anything but the law and evidence, and by fair, impartial, and intelligent juries, who will do right according to the evidence, and not be swayed by passion or prejudice.

Therefore, sir, I hope that this law will not remain another hour on our statute-book. It is a farce to be appropriating money to administer justice in those States with such a machinery as this to get jurors that must sit in every criminal case and in every case of importance arising between parties in an action at common law in reference to property.

Now, Mr. President, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to speak of the other clause of this bill proposing to repeal some sections of the statutes and amend others; and to speak also in reference to the use of the Army at the elections, which, it is claimed, should be authorized. First, allow me to ask men of every party here and elsewhere who love this Government of ours and desire that it shall be perpetuated, whether they really on reflection are in favor of allowing the executive officers of the Federal Government, who have the entire control of the Army, to have the Army at the polls with a view to keep the peace or act in any other way in reference to elections? This ought not to be a party question and ought not to be discussed in a partisan spirit. Every patriotic man in this country and every honest man in this country is interested in perpetuating our Government and our institutions, which have showered their blessings on us, and which will bless our children if we but preserve them from the dangers that from time to time environ them.

More than forty years ago, in the canvass of 1840, when I was quite a young man, I remember many able men spoke earnestly as to the danger which menaced this Government from the power, patronage, and influence of the Federal Executive and those appointed by him. It was said, I think by Mr. Webster, that it had largely increased, it was increasing, and ought to be checked. The patronage then was as nothing to what it is now; there were few offices and no pretension was made that the Army could be used in reference to elections. Now you have one hundred thousand office-holders, active, intelligent men, holding office all the time under and by favor of the Federal Government, and the claim is that in addition to supervisors and marshals and this army of office-holders of one hundred thousand in round numbers, the Executive should and shall have the right to order the Army to the places of elections, to be there under the orders and control of men who will be partisans there, the civil officers, the supervisors, and the marshals; and it is said here that men who stand up and insist that this use of the Army ought to be prohibited must be men who desire violence and who desire fraud at the elections. I heard that with some surprise. I judge not other men, but I should have felt that I did a great wrong if I had said it of any party of men in this Government who were seeking to prevent the use of the Army at the polls. If I understood the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM]—I have not had an opportunity to read his speech, and I may not quote him aright—but as I listened to him, he said "free mobs and free frauds are dear to democrats." Is that the spirit in which we should discuss this grave question? Does he believe there is any truth in it, speaking as a man? Is it not a great slander upon two hundred and fifty thousand majority of the voters of this Union as their votes were cast at the election of 1876? Sir, no good will come to our country, no chord that will benefit our country will be touched in the popular heart of honest men if we here in debating a question like this appeal to sectional passions or party prejudices, saying, "We are the party of honesty and patriotism, and the others are all men that want free mobs and free frauds at elections." It is not true. I thank my Maker that yet the great mass of the American people of both political parties in my judgment are honest and love this country, and want that done, not which will enable their party to win, but that done which shall preserve this Government as it came to us, restore it back to the ancient ways which were pursued in the best days of the Republic.

Why, sir, let our opponents in politics remember that if the Army is authorized to be used at the polls to influence or interfere with or sway elections, while they may be in power to-day another party may be in power to-morrow; and such is human nature, not in the mass of the people but in many of those who are active in party politics, that whichever party has this power by law it will often be greatly abused.

The citizens of the States managing their own affairs assemble at elections with more or less political (and I never object to that) warmth and zeal. If one party, be it democratic or republican, can have civil officers, supervisors, and deputy marshals there, and can have the United States Army to back them up in the orders they give, the party in power will have a dangerous advantage over the peaceable honest citizens who have no such accessories. If my own party friends were in power and there was a proposition to forbid any such use of the Army, I should feel ashamed of myself before my fellowmen if I would not urge and act as earnestly to take from my political friends such power as I now do to take it from my political opponents.

Let us not forget that this is a system of laws as to the elections which, if not repealed, is to exist and be used by one party or the other all the time. It is a system that if we do not change it will be used by the party men who are in power from time to time; and my apprehension is, my solicitude is, not that there will be a revolution to-day, but when I observe that from a claim which was made and exercised in the time of the war and which was rebuked and checked by the law of 1865, there has now grown up a claim even under a restraining law that there is a power in the Executive to have the Army at the polls, to be used there in reference to elections, I fear that unless this Congress (or if they will not do it the people will elect a Congress that will) shall by law forbid any such use, you will find this power used not to preserve the peace, although that may be the name given to the pretense, not to prevent fraud, for armies are not very good engines to prevent fraud, but it will be used to keep a party in power, and will be a potent factor in keeping in power the party, democrat or republican, which has the marshals and supervisors and the Army on election day to overawe quiet citizens and to enforce arbitrary powers, which may produce results very different from what the honest vote honestly counted of the people would have produced.

The question has been argued very elaborately. The Executive refuses to sign a bill forbidding the use of troops at elections, and he thinks there ought to be this power in the President to enforce on election day at the polls what the officers there who have the Army with them say is the law in reference to the electors and the officers of election.

Mr. President, let us think of this free from partisan feeling or passion or prejudice. For more than seventy-five years this Government existed, and no statesman, no politician, no citizen dared ever to avow the idea that he thought the Executive should have the Army at the polls under the pretense of keeping the peace. The laws of 1792 and 1795 and 1807 have been read in this debate; but was there ever a man prior to a very recent day who claimed that those laws did, or that any laws should, authorize the President to send the Army to the polls to aid either side or to interfere with elections.

We certainly had very fierce party contests during the war of 1812, high feeling at the polls and great struggles; but did either party claim that there was any right in the President under those laws to send the Army to the polls and interfere with the citizens who were there present to vote? When you read them, what are those laws aimed at? Were those laws passed to have the Army at the elections? No, sir. They are laws aimed at an entirely different state of things, as their language shows. When the laws of Congress are resisted by combinations, or by rebellion so strong that the civil officers executing judicial process cannot overcome them by the posse comitatus, then the President may call out the militia; but I put it to every man, is there anything more sophistical than to say that there was any pretense, or that there was any intent by the makers of those laws, or any thought by those who executed them for seventy-odd years, that the President might, at the solicitation of his political partisans, send an army of soldiers to the polls to interfere with elections? They were wise enough to know that if there was power to make any such law (a question that I will not trouble the Senate with discussing now) there was such danger of its abuse that it never ought to be enacted. Who can forget what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] read, the letter of a Senator in this body telling his friend that he had seen General Terry and that United States troops would be sent to Alabama with a view to the election, and to use them to run off white voters so they would not vote. Did he tell General Terry he wanted troops to run the white men out of the country under pretense that they were rebels? Oh, no; he probably told him what partisan politicians may say to get troops sent to the polls only: "There is a great danger of mobs and frauds, and I want soldiers to keep the peace;" and then he writes his political henchman, in the letter that was read, "send the troops to such a county and they will terrify the people with the idea that they are to be arrested by the military, and they will run away before election day and not vote." Any claim that there should be authority in the executive officers in advance to send United States troops to be on election day at the polls for any purpose is at war with all the traditions of the American people derived from those speaking the same language and from whom we took many of our institutions.

The English people are a more turbulent people than ours. We used to read constantly of the mobs and the violence at heated elections there, but for more than two hundred years there has been upon the statute-books of Great Britain a law forbidding soldiers to be stationed within a mile of the place of holding an election, and if they happen to be stationed there they must be kept within their barracks on election day. Yet, here in America, where the people are sovereign in reference to their ballots and by means of their ballots, where the people should be allowed to have free elections, unsurrounded by any emblems of military power under the control of one of the parties, in a country with such traditions and with such institutions, I ask our friends on the other side of the Chamber whether they believe it would be wise or well for this Republic of ours to allow either party, whichever has control of the Federal Government, to use the Army on election day in connection with or in reference to the elections?

Why, sir, in the days of the war, when in many States there was a very abnormal condition even where the war was not raging, there was no law that authorized it, yet military commanders assumed to take charge of the elections and to decide the qualifications of voters. The law of 1865 was passed while the war still raged, in February of that year, and even then, with an overwhelming majority in both Houses of republicans, there were enough republicans who were true to the wise traditions of our country to enact a law forbidding military men to issue such orders and declaring that troops should not be at the polls except to resist armed rebellion and to preserve the peace. That exception was put in in the Senate against the wishes of the friends of the bill. The democrats voted for it in the House because they could not change the bill as they wanted it, and there was some excuse for saying that perchance in some of the border States it might be needed during the war to preserve the peace. But now, if I understand the argument on the other side and the clamor which is made against us, it is claimed that there ought to be this power to prevent democratic violence or democratic fraud! Mr. President, I have sometimes thought the gentlemen on that side were disposed to use the word "fraud" in reference to elections very unwisely. There are people who will think of other frauds in our elections than democratic frauds when they are using that word in connection with elections and the use of the Army around returning boards and canvassing boards.

But the war is over. The slightest pretense, it seems to me, for retaining an implied or express power that the President should have a right to send the Army to election places to be ordered around and to execute the orders of civilians who claim authority under the election laws has passed away. The time has come when all such pretense of power, whether the democrats wield the Federal power or whether the republican or any other party wield it, should be abandoned for the sake of our institutions, for the peace and good order of our people, for the benefit of all good men. We should take away all such claim of power, and I think it should be done now. But if we are not able to do it now—I am for doing all things properly and in order—if for any reason Congress cannot enact it now, I desire to appeal to the people of this country of both parties that they see to it that they express their sentiments and put in officers to execute the duties of their Government who will pass a law restraining everybody from using the Army on election day at the polls.

Look back to our former years of party conflict, years when there were mobs at elections, years when men who had a right to claim protection, if any citizen had, the naturalized citizens, were hunted by mobs from the polls, their dwellings mobbed, their churches mobbed, and when riot ran rough-shod over them on election day and other days; and yet although the democrats sympathized with them, the democrats never dreamed that the Army could be sent to the polls to see that those naturalized citizens were not hunted down because they happened to have been born in other lands or because they happened to profess a creed which for the time being there was prejudice against.

I appeal to the record of our own party with pride. Neither during the turmoils and troubles of the war of 1812, nor during the riots and outrages of the know-nothing party in politics, did any man ever claim or want to claim that the Federal power should interfere at elections to prevent mobs driving men away from the polls? The State authorities, it was understood, must preserve the peace; but if there was an insurrection or anything which they could not suppress, they could call, according to the Constitution, on the Federal Government for aid; but the notion that a file of soldiers was to be sent with a sergeant or a company with a captain to enforce the rights of Mr. KERNAN or anybody else to vote at the polls, is not my notion of American liberty guarded by law and protected against military power.

I fear, sir, if this power is recognized and its use not forbidden, it will soon come to pass that the party in power, whichever it is, heated, zealous, with many unscrupulous men as well as many patriotic men in it, will retain power by virtue of its patronage and marshals who are backed up on election day by troops at the polls. They will retain it against the will of majorities which would exist if the people could give free expression to their will. No, sir, I am not to be told when I urge as earnestly and as honestly as I ever felt on any public measure, as free from selfishness and party as I ever spoke on any occasion, that I am an enemy of free elections or a friend of fraud at the polls. Sir, I am for peaceable elections; I am for honest voting; and I am for an honest count of the votes of the citizens after they have been cast, and if either party violates or either party has violated this principle, I am in favor at all times of doing that which I believe will remedy these evils, and which cannot be used to destroy the rights of the citizens and which would enable a minority to prevail at elections and retain power by the influence and power of the Federal Government exercised at the polls through civilians backed up by armed troops.

Honest and peaceful elections will, in my judgment, best be secured by the people of the respective States. They will not be secured by the use of the Army of the United States, in my opinion. Whenever the time comes that the citizens of this country, the sovereigns as they stand to-day, with all power as to measures and men to administer them in their hands by their votes at the ballot-box—whenever the day comes that our people permit themselves to be policed by the soldiers of the Federal Government at elections, I fear the days will quickly follow when the party in power will retain power without regard to the will of the people. You will have more than a third term of some bold, strong man; he may not be a very bad man, but, backed up by a party deeply interested in favor of retaining power, he will perpetuate his own authority.

Sir, it was said by some of the early patriots of this country in reference to our own institutions that we must not forget that republics had often been overthrown by men who claimed that they were acting for the preservation of liberty and republican institutions, and we were warned that the people should keep all power in their own hands. The argument I would urge is, that we permit no man, whether he be a democrat or a republican, that we allow no man holding the executive power to have the right to bring to the elections the Army. If you do, you may have very peaceful elections, but you will have them as peaceful and as unanimous in favor of the man in power, whether he be called president or emperor, as was the election in France when a republic was overthrown by a popular election guarded and controlled by armed soldiers.

Sir, when our people have not the virtue, the courage, the loyalty to law and to liberty to see to it that every citizen at the polls has a right to be free from violence and deposit his ballot according to his judgment, then when the mass are not thus inclined there will speedily be an end to our Republic.

Sir, I heard with surprise, and with much mortification and pain, my colleague [Mr. CONKLING] speak of the State which we each in part have the honor to represent. The argument was that we required the Federal Army there to protect the citizens of a portion of our State from "the thugs and shoulder-hitters and repeaters, all the carriers of slung-shots, dirks, and bludgeons, all the fraternity of bucket-shops, the rat-pits," and the products of what he chose to call the "slums" of New York. I heard this with regret, because I think he will realize himself that while there may be in a great city, and doubtless is, ruffianism, while there are dishonest men, yet the great mass of the people of both political parties, thank God, in our State, are willing and are able through themselves and their State and municipal governments to keep the peace at the polls. The mass of the citizens of New York of both political parties understand that there comes a swift destruction of all the prosperity of their glorious State, of that republic within a republic, of this glorious Union of which she has ever stood in support, whenever mobs and violence prevail on election day to an extent seriously to interfere with the citizens expressing their sovereign will at the ballot-box. While I may have some party prejudice, and while I may have at times complained and may again complain of things done by political opponents in the State, yet I say it with pride that I believe the great mass of the citizens, men who are not office-holders nor office-seekers, the great mass of our industrious, intelligent, thrifty, and active population, love this country, and are intelligent enough to know that its institutions will be preserved only by seeing to it that riot or violence or fraud do not prevail at the elections.

When and where has there been a serious riot at elections in New York? I remember none. The riot my colleague alluded to, which occurred in July, 1863, had no origin in elections, nor in partisan feeling in reference to elections. We all deplored it. How did it happen? Not from the weakness of our State. What caused it? A certain law, and especially the way it was executed, a law which I hope never again to see enacted by this Republic in peace or in war. New York and the other States which adhered to the Union, in answer to the calls for troops in 1861 and 1862, sent out volunteer regiments of brave, honest, fearless men of both parties, until, you remember, the Secretary of War put a stop to volunteering, because he had all the troops he wanted. After that a law was passed. What was it? Not a law providing for a call for troops from the States, and if they did not send them to get men by draft, but it was a law that there should be an enrollment of all able-bodied citizens between certain ages, and there should be a draft, and every poor man who could not raise $300 must leave wife and children starving and go into the Army for $13 a month. The men who could pay $300 might stay at home. I know how it affected the city where I live. We had no mobs, but our citizens came together and quieted the feeling which arose out of the idea that this was a law and scheme to make the poor man go to the battlefield and leave all who could raise $300 at home. Doubtless, evil-minded men fanned this dissatisfaction to an unjustifiable extent in the city of New York.

Of my own personal knowledge I knew nothing of this matter. My home is a long distance from the city of New York, and I heard nothing of the riots except as stated in the newspapers. Laboring-men in that city were agitated. They said, "Here they let every rich man's son stay at home; every man of property can stay at home; and we men who have wife and children dependent on what we earn must march to the front and get $13 a month in money worth about thirty or forty cents on the dollar in the coin of the world." They were excited. What was the condition of the city of New York? It had a republican mayor, Mr. Opdyke. The State had a democratic governor, Horatio Seymour. This trouble broke out at the time of all others when it could best get head, because Governor Seymour had just before that riot, in answer to the call of the President and Secretary of War on the State of New York, sent nearly all our national-guard regiments from the city of New York and along the Hudson River over to Pennsylvania to aid in repelling the armed raid which was made into that State. He was thanked by both the President and Secretary for his promptness and efficiency. Just at that time this riot broke out. It was not an election riot, but it was a riot of men wrought up and worked upon by designing men no doubt. The governor immediately came to the city. He ordered regiments from a distance; and the riot was quelled. While I deplore and regret that any destruction of property took place, especially that an orphan asylum was burned, I cannot forget that such things have happened in other cities. They ought never to happen, but they have happened in other cities where there was no such aggravating cause. Women and children were mobbed in the city of Boston and the buildings that sheltered them burned down and they driven into the bushes on their own grounds. I do not blame the city authorities of Boston. It was one of those outbreaks of passion that cannot always be prevented or controlled, although they are always to be deplored.

I repeat that we were able and willing then to keep the peace, and the riot would have been more promptly suppressed but for the fact that this body of citizen soldiers were away doing their duty, which certainly the governor of New York never failed to perform. You may attack him and traduce him, but he sent out more than the quota of the State, and could not get it credited for a long time. He never stood on the law and said "I will not send more." Finally, when they got a commission to examine it, Mr. Stanton had to admit that our quota had been more than filled.

Another thing as to New York about riots. I ask when at an election has there been any serious riot there? I know of none in the city, none in the country. We can and do keep the peace. In 1877, when under the stress of hard times on the laboring-men all over the country, designing men had wrought them up to a state of violence which broke out in Maryland, in West Virginia, in Pennsylvania, in Illinois, and in New Jersey, I believe New York kept peace all over the State. No violence was done to persons or property in our State. Our own militia were held in readiness and the population were warned, and the peace was kept without calling upon the Federal Government, which some of the other States were compelled to do; and I speak it not to their disparagement, but to remind Senators that the State of New York could and did preserve law and order.

I only want to say that we do take care in that great State of our people; we do take care that there shall be protection to property and protection to life under the law. I want to do justice to New Jersey; I thought there was some trouble there; but my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] says to me that a single manly, good-tempered, right-minded deputy sheriff took the ground and put himself in the way to quell and did quell the riot in New Jersey. In our State we did it without ever using violence, but we did it by warning these people that we had a national guard of citizen soldiers that any people should be proud of. The clerks, business men, and mechanics of the cities, the best of our young men in the country, are armed and drilled, and without pay they were ready to march, and some of them did go, to scenes of threatened danger; but we preserved the peace.

Therefore, sir, I repeat with pride as one of her citizens that the State of New York is able and is willing on election days and all days to protect her citizens against mobs and violence without reference to their creed, without reference to their party, without reference to the country where they were born. The broad protecting shield of her laws and her authority is always invoked, and her citizens hail it with the greatest pleasure when it is invoked to defend those against whom prejudice and passion have been fanned, in all the rights of citizens of that State and of the United States. Sir, the State of New York has election laws that I invite gentlemen from any State to examine. Their object is to preserve the peace on election day and to preserve the purity of the ballot-box. I am not going to trouble you by reading them, but I chance to remember, and I will turn to one section in what we call our bill of rights re-enacted the last time, I think, in 1830:

> The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, is forever to be allowed in this State to all mankind.

Others of the same character were put in our constitution:

> All elections ought to be free; and no person, by force of arms, malice, menacing, or otherwise, shall presume to disturb or hinder any citizen of this State in the free exercise of the right of suffrage.

Some one may say "that is good if you will enforce it." We have the most stringent laws to protect the ballot-box. We have not yet quite got up to the notion that the governor shall send a file of soldiers on our side, if we happen to be in power, to declare the officers who shall hold it or who shall not. But if you will turn to our election laws you will find that we seek to do it as all laws are enforced in a country where liberty prevails and where liberty is to be preserved. They are laws forbidding wrong and punishing the wrongdoers, not by a file of soldiers at the polls, but by trial and indictment and incarceration and fine.

I am not going to stop to read them, but you will find in our Revised Statutes, volume 1, sixth edition, page 451, provisions in reference to elections generally. It is an old law. One of the sections shows that our people, not in a new-born zeal, not in a partisan spirit, long ago resolved to forbid any military officer to call out his company or regiment on election days under a severe penalty, unless it be on the call of the proper authorities to suppress insurrection or rebellion or mob violence. I believe that is incorporated into the laws of a good many of the States.

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. KERNAN. I will read it after reading one or two other provisions of our statute. One provision is:

> If any person shall by bribery—

I fear the corrupting influence of money in this Government and I want this law enforced:

> If any person shall by bribery, menace, or other corrupt means or device whatsoever, either directly or indirectly, attempt to influence any elector of this State in giving his vote or ballot, or deter him from giving the same, or disturb or hinder him in the free exercise of the right of suffrage, at any election within this State, held pursuant to this chapter, and shall thereof be convicted, such person so offending and convicted shall be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined or imprisoned, according to the discretion of the court before which such conviction shall be had; such fine in no case to exceed $500, nor such imprisonment one year.

Is there any other mode of protection known to the land? Can you send a soldiery there to say to the man "You are menacing this voter and we will arrest you and take you off." No, sir, we punish him. Laws are enforced in a land of liberty protected by law, not by bayonets, but by courts. Section 5 of the election laws of the State of New York (see page 451, first volume of the Revised Statutes of New York, sixth edition) is as follows:

> If any officer or other person shall call out or order any of the militia of this State to appear and exercise on any day during any election to be held by virtue of this chapter, or within five days previous thereto, except in cases of invasion or insurrection, he shall forfeit the sum of $500 for every such offense.

But I am taking too much time. I have referred to the statutes in our States relating to the inspectors of elections.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me to ask him when that statute was passed?

Mr. KERNAN. It is an old statute.

Mr. EATON. I supposed so.

Mr. KERNAN. This volume refers to the first revised laws that were enacted in 1813, section 9.

Mr. EATON. My impression was that it was passed in 1801.

Mr. KERNAN. I think the Senator is right. I have lost the reference. It refers to the revised laws which were enacted as early as 1813, and they were revisions of prior laws.

Therefore I want to say to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] that there is no new-born zeal in this opposition to having soldiers, even our own State soldiers, about the polls on election days. Our inspectors are to be elected, and it is so arranged that there shall be in every precinct three inspectors, one of one party and two of the other, and they cannot be all of one party. They are not there to arrest every man who they think is not a voter; but if they challenge him he must swear on his oath that he is entitled to vote; and if he swears falsely he can be indicted and punished. The inspectors are to tell him their objections before the voter takes the oath. By another section, if disorder occurs our boards of inspectors may make out a warrant commanding the sheriff or deputy or a constable to arrest the man making the disturbance or who hinders or obstructs voting, and if there is no deputy sheriff or constable there, they may appoint a person who shall make the arrest and hand him over to the officers. But what says our Federal law? Is it like the laws that are enforced in the States? The very section of our State law which I have read declares that no man, though under arrest, shall be deprived of voting if he claims he has a right to vote and takes the oath.

That there are frauds now and then, and that there were great scandals in the city of New York for a short time I regret, but it was when a few men had intrenched themselves and were plundering that city, as it turned out, and sharing the plunder without reference to politics. But we have ample laws and we have good courts, and we have vigilant district attorneys, and each party will be active to see that the State election laws are carried out. I do not dispute that there are sometimes frauds and corruptions in the cities, and there may be in the country, but what I am saying for New York is that the mass of our citizens of both parties desire honest elections, and will see to it that election day does not become a day of riot.

New York City has a police of about two thousand men, an efficient police; and while there are, as in every great city, dishonest men, thieves, robbers, and ruffians, yet, looking at that city from one end of the year to the other, there is peace and protection within her borders. She was alluded to in order to point a different argument, when with a view which I cannot understand unless it was to arouse sectional prejudice it was said that of the $234,831,461.77 of revenue paid into the Treasury of this Government $13,627,193.19 was paid from the eleven States who were in rebellion, and the other twenty-seven States paid all the rest, $221,204,268.58. As New York has been maligned and as these twenty-seven States were so bepraised I looked up the statistics, and I found that out of the $221,204,268.58 paid by the twenty-seven States which were called those which adhered to the Union, the State of New York paid $103,002,471.50, nearly one-half of that amount. Of the $130,170,680.20 paid into the United States Treasury for customs dues there was collected in New York $93,085,262.81, nearly three-fourths of the entire amount. Of the internal-revenue tax on our productions New York paid during the last fiscal year $14,917,208.69, more than four times as much as the entire six New England States paid. If we begin to talk here as to which of these States shall stand the highest and have the most weight, and decide these questions on the ground that the State in which the most revenue is collected shall have the highest position, it would be a very queer state of things. But as a fact or as an argument I thought it amounted to nothing. The $93,085,262.81 of customs dues collected in New York were paid into the Treasury by our enterprising merchants, but that tax was paid by the people of every State who consumed the goods on which duty was paid. The people of our State paid their share as others did. The internal-revenue tax paid upon domestic manufactures and products was paid by the people who consumed the products and manufactures. Therefore there is no reason to try to arouse prejudice between the people of the States by claiming that we paid more into the Treasury than others did.

Without detaining the Senate further I think it will be admitted that the way and the only way known to people loving liberty and meaning to preserve it is provided by the State of New York to protect citizens on election day from violence, and from fraud, and that this as a rule has been successfully put in force in our State.

There was something said about the election of 1870. It was said that in 1870 there was a state of alarm and excitement in the city of New York just before the election, and that they had there an honest election, because the President of the United States sent into the harbor armed vessels of the Navy and sent into the city soldiers. I will say a word about the election in 1870. There was excitement I am told, and I believe men who had no good design as to the election, and who were willing to carry it by force or in any other way they could, made the President believe that there was danger of a riot there. I know nothing of it personally. I am informed that after it was stated that troops would be sent to New York there was excitement not among the thugs and thieves but among the honest, manly citizens of all parties who were not hot partisans, because in our great city with its police and with eight or nine regiments of citizen soldiers who never fail to do their duty in keeping the peace it was claimed that Federal soldiers were to come into our streets and go to the polls to keep the peace and enforce the orders of Federal officers at our election.

Sir, as you have doubtless seen in the public prints, the governor of that State (Hoffman) took efficient means to preserve the peace and prevent any kind of collision in our city. He was ready and willing to protect everybody, as he did; and no Federal soldier during that day showed himself in the streets of New York. If they were there they came in a quiet way and kept out of sight. The governor was ready and prepared if there was the least danger of disorder and violence to preserve the peace through the civil authorities, through the posse comitatus, and if need be through the citizen soldiers, not the hirelings brought there but the reputable citizen soldiers of both parties forming regiments in the city of New York. There was no need then or at any time since of any Federal soldiers at all to keep the peace. While it may not have been intended by the President, it was a dangerous menace to our people, that might have led to disorder if firm and patriotic action had not been taken to prevent it.

But the argument is put forth that the President has the right, and ought to have, to send the United States Army to elections because the Constitution says "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." What is the true meaning of this? What do Americans understand by this? Does it mean that the President is to have at elections United States troops to enforce the laws at the point of the bayonet, so that one man shall be allowed to vote and another shall not by the officers conducting the elections?

Sir, this is a new idea of power in the President to enforce the laws in this country. I understand that above all others ours is a government of law, and that laws are enforced through the courts by the civil officers, and that the military is only to be used when there are illegal combinations or rebellion against the civil power too strong to be overcome by the judicial and civil officers with the aid of the posse comitatus. Am I not right? We say a man shall have the right to do so and so, and another man is forbidden to do so and so, at elections, if you please. It is a new idea to me to say that any governor or President can send armed men to the polls to enforce the right of the one to vote and to prohibit the other. We secure the voter the right by punishing according to law those who prevent in any way the citizen from exercising the right of suffrage, and we punish the man through the courts who exercises it illegally. Whenever you come to any other system of enforcing the laws and say that the President has any right in that case to send armed men to the polls to enforce your election laws, then we have got into what would be Russian law, pasha law, the President or his officers determining what shall be done and determining what is the meaning of the law, who have the right to vote and who not, and sending his armed soldiers to enforce the decision of himself or his officers on these questions.

Sir, there is no such right vested in any executive officer in this country, be he Federal or State. It is true by our State law every man living so many days in the State and district and being a citizen has a right to vote. Suppose the inspector should say, "You cannot vote unless you take the oath prescribed by law," can the President or the governor or any other executive officer send soldiers there to say "You must let him vote?" Our laws provide that the illegal voter can be punished, and the rights of the people are preserved by punishing him.

It is argued, and argued in this Chamber, that soldiers should be at the polls to prevent fraud. That is not required, and the Army is not an instrument by which frauds will be prevented. When men are tempted to commit frauds, whether they are voters, inspectors, canvassers, or any other class of men, they are generally timid, and they are induced to do it usually by promises of protection from those in power. The tempted, corrupt man likes to have the Army about to protect him when he is perpetrating an outrage or a fraud just as the canvassing boards that perpetrated the gross frauds in Florida and Louisiana in 1876 had the Army standing all around them protecting them. I do not mean to say that it was knowingly done by the soldiers, but you will find that where there are dangerous and gross frauds perpetrated on the people by executive officers the danger comes from the protection of strong partisans having the power to bring the Army to protect them.

The argument that we need the Army to protect the people from frauds on the ballot-box attracted my attention, and I remembered what I had read in the report of the majority and minority of the Committee on Alleged Frauds in the late Presidential Election, that when the Army is brought in as a factor to prevent frauds it may be used by those who desire to commit frauds. I read what the majority of the committee—and I read this to illustrate, I do not want to argue the question—find as facts. They say:

> In Florida the board of State canvassers usurped discretionary powers and reversed the result of the votes cast. They did this in the presence of certain visiting statesmen sent there by the President of the United States and surrounded by Federal troops.

The same is found as to Louisiana. The canvassing or returning board were encouraged by powerful politicians of the dominant party; they were supported in the exercise of this power. I will now read as to how they did in Louisiana:

> On the other hand, the election in Louisiana was determined by a partisan returning board, exercising discretionary revisory power over the votes cast This power was unauthorized; but even if authorized the board flagrantly and outrageously abused it. They were supported in its exercise by visiting statesmen, sent also by the President to Louisiana. They were surrounded while engaged in it by Federal troops.

No, sir; when corruption undermines this Government it will be when partisan men have control of the Army and Navy and use them to protect the timid who, devoid of honor and of conscience, will for patronage or pay falsify the canvass or the count to defeat the will of the electors. Was there ever such a fraud as this perpetrated without there being power to protect those who did it? What does the minority of the committee say in their report at page 89? The Army was there:

> But it appears that two of the electors were absent and their names were signed by some other person.

A forgery of the very names of the electors! The Army was there surrounding the state-house. What does General Butler say about it? The Army was there protecting them all. General Butler, who made an independent report, says:

> That if any legal election was held in Louisiana, then the majority of the votes actually cast in the State were for the Tilden electors and for Governor Nicholls.

He expresses in his report the opinion that the votes of Louisiana should not have been counted for either party, but he says:

> That the counting in of Mr. Hayes was obtained by a series of gross and unjustifiable irregularities and frauds, which cannot be too strongly condemned and reprobated.

Yet there was no mob; there was no violence. These boards were surrounded by those who had control of the United States troops when these gross frauds and forgeries were perpetrated in reference to a presidential election, but for which the result of the election would have been the other way, according to this evidence and according to these reports of the majority and General Butler. I observe in this report that the majority of the committee say, in reference to the use of troops, what expresses my idea better than my own language. They say in their elaborate report, page 64:

> Nor can the danger of interfering in local elections by Federal troops, whether to protect officials in the exercise of discretion or to coerce citizens or to aid voters, be overrated. If an election cannot be conducted without foreign troops to protect the men who vote and the men who count, there should be no election. Military used to protect those who count and those who vote will prove to be military used to put down liberty under the guise of protecting it, and to be the more dangerous because of its disguise.

I concur in every word of this, and therefore I believe I am urging that which is best for my country, its people and political institutions, when I urge our friends on the other side, and citizens of their party as well as those of my own side, that we see to it that there shall be no interference by the Army at the polls controlled by civil officers of one party or the other.

I have heard it said, and I heard it with humiliation, that under the reign of Tweed and his clique there were peculations and frauds at the elections in the city of New York. I cannot deny it. I never understood that the fraud was in keeping men who had a right to vote from the polls, or in allowing illegal votes, but it consisted of a way they had of transferring the votes from one candidate to another, by corrupt practices in the canvass of the votes and making the returns. You have probably all read what has been published in reference to the fraud perpetrated under Tweed in reference to the election of judges of the court of appeals, elected a few years since. Votes were transferred in the canvass from two of the democratic candidates to two of the five minority judges voted for, so as to elect these two over others, to accommodate, as is stated, some political friends of Tweed in the republican party. I do not believe the two judges thus elected had anything to do with or knew of this fraud. Mr. Tweed intrenched himself in power in the city of New York against the protests of leading democrats of that city by the aid, as I understood, of republican members of the Legislature.

But, sir, as to this virulent attack upon the democratic party of the State of New York and the great mass of the members of that party, I am not here to defend them. They need no defense from me. I am not here to say that there have not been corrupt men who at times have held power in the name of that party in the city of New York, but I point to the history of my State and that great city, and leave it to gentlemen to judge of the character of the great body of the democrats of that State and city when I name the men and the only men they have elected governors since 1830, nearly fifty years. We have elected a good many of them, and who were they? Were they such men as would be selected by thugs and thieves and knaves, men who wanted a dishonest administration, or were they among the best citizens of this Union? Who were they? They were Marcy, William L. Marcy was elected governor three times——

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from New York inform me whether that is the same name that is frequently credited with the epigrammatic sentence, "To the victors belong the spoils?"

Mr. KERNAN. I have heard it said that Mr. Marcy used that language, but I believe it was not a doctrine that he had to preach to my friend's party, (the republican,) for I think they never failed to take advantage of the spoils and change everything from a doorkeeper, up and down, when they came into power in my State as well as in the Union. Everybody knows how it was here when they were in power. I have heard it stated that Mr. Marcy said that, and it was doubtless a joke, when some men were whining, who had put all their own political friends in power, because of a change, as was the case here recently when our friends on the other side began to mourn and look solemn when they lost some of the officers of this body. I have listened to these sermons here time and again. I suppose Mr. Marcy, in answer to such mournful complaining, said that to the victors belong the spoils, and that it was proper to put some of his own political friends in office. But the man who says to a republican or democrat in the State of New York that William L. Marcy was not patriotic and able and honest will get an answer that will rebuke him. Filling high offices all his life, it is true that he never amassed anything like wealth, although an economical man. He served the State and country from the time he was a young man. He was the comptroller of our State and its governor two or three times, holding office here as Secretay of War, and he always administered the trust confided to him in a way that might have been an example to other Secretaries of War who have administered the Department here. There were under him no briberies, no corruptions, no levying of blackmail out of post-traders. Nothing like that could be said of William L. Marcy, in war or in peace.

I will name the rest of the governors who were elected by "the thugs and the thieves and the bucket-men and the shoulder-hitters," as the democracy of New York City have been called, for no men were ever more popular in the State or the city of New York among the democrats than Marcy and the others that I will name. William C. Bouck was another, the old canal commissioner, who looked after the canals and promoted their best interests for years. Silas Wright, the synonym of honesty, ability, and patriotism. Horatio Seymour, elected time and again, who, notwithstanding all that has been said of him politically by his political opponents, cannot walk into any assemblage of the citizens of either party in our State that enthusiastic manifestations of respect and esteem do not go up spontaneously to the drowning of any man's voice who is talking, no matter who he may be. John T. Hoffman, Samuel J. Tilden, Lucius Robinson, who is our governor now. I point to these governors who have been elected for forty-odd years by our party, and every one of them was honest, zealous for good order, honest administration, the protection of the people against improper taxation, and against wrongs of every kind. Yet you are asked to believe that the party that always selected such men is a party that wants fraud and robbery and violence and the rule of ruffianism in our State.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that the Senator from New York mentioned some one by the name of Tilden. I should like to inquire whether he is the man who is under prosecution at the present time for not paying his income tax?

Mr. KERNAN. When I was last in New York I understood (I do not speak from personal knowledge, but I heard it) that the suit about the income tax was started when he was made a candidate for the Presidency, and that the Government had failed to make a case and themselves asked that the suit go over, and that whenever it is finished Tilden will be vindicated and the suit decided in his favor.

Mr. WINDOM. In order to identify him, is he the same one who sent the democratic dispatch of which Greeley spoke, that was to provide for keeping back the returns from the State until New York City got through voting?

Mr. KERNAN. My friend surely, if he read the papers, read Mr. Tilden's indignant denial, that although he was chairman of the State committee, he never sent the dispatch, and never knew that it was sent till long after, but that it was sent by the friends of Mr. Tweed.

Mr. EATON. Was he, permit me to ask, the gentleman who was elected President of the United States and defrauded out of it by this party of honest gentlemen over on the other side? [Laughter.]

Mr. KERNAN. I must assent to it that he is the same gentleman.

Mr. EATON. I thought he was.

Mr. KERNAN. With the suit alluded to pending, with all the vituperation and calumny that the press poured on him, a very large majority of the citizens of the United States voted for him, believing that he was the man who would clean out the Augean stables of fraud which had gathered in the administration of the affairs of the Union, as he had stopped the peculations which had grown up in regard to the canals in New York.

Mr. President, it is answer enough to every man who has passed through our State or dwelt in it to simply say that her people deserve no such descriptive phrases as have been applied to them here. The people of neither of the parties in that State deserve them. Her five million people mainly consist of intelligent, patriotic, virtuous, law-abiding, enterprising people, who devote themselves to business in all the walks of life. Although there have been in the democratic party in New York men who were corrupt, although there have been in the democratic party in the city of New York men who were corrupt, although Tweed and his associates were elected by the democratic party, and by virtue of the power held from that party he did plunder the people for a time and brought reproach upon that party, while I admit that this is true yet I say with pride the democratic party of New York overthrew Tweed and drove some of his associates into exile, put him and others in jail, and by suits recovered back all they could of what was wrongfully taken from the public. It was done by the democratic party of the State and of the city acting together. If we suffered by corruption there was virtue enough and patriotism enough among the mass of our democrats to purge out from their party Tweed and his associates and go to political defeat in 1871 rather than to have any aid from him and his corrupt confederates when we discovered what their conduct had been.

I did not intend to enter into a partisan debate. I do not believe there is much good to be derived in debating a great question like the one before us by one party charging on the other frauds or riots or some exceptional thing, and the other party retorting, "you did as bad." But, sir, the democratic party of New York, so much denounced and maligned, did purge themselves from corrupt members, did restore good government to the city, did triumph over all the combinations and wealth of Tweed and of the men who aided him for the share of the plunder that he gave them; may I not ask did the republican party act so? Tweed's frauds were discovered in 1871, and corrected and punished. What else happened in 1870, and 1871, and 1872? Doubtless against the will of a great majority of the republican party there grew up maladministration and corruption in Federal affairs, which I allude to not of my knowledge but on the testimony of Sumner, and Greeley, and Trumbull, and other leading men of the republican party, given to the public in the press and in addresses over their signatures that there had grown up in the administration of the Federal affairs so much of corruption and maladministration and so many men were engaged in it that they had lost hope that the republican party could reform it, and they made that the ground of an effort to create a third party. Tweed was guilty of fraud. Have not our republican friends some sins of omission if we democrats had? Sir, since I came into this Chamber I have heard facts and I have participated in proceedings showing what members of the republican party did and were permitted to do here in the District of Columbia, plundering the property-owners and the public Treasury, and doing things as corrupt surely as anything that was ever done by Tweed and his associates. We have had here in Washington rings, whisky rings reaching from Saint Louis, and connected, as it was said and believed, with men near those in place and power. We have had members of the Cabinet engaged in corrupt practices. Would it be just for me to say that because a Cabinet official only escaped conviction for corrupt practices in office or impeachment by flying from office when the fact was first discovered, would it be right or just in me, because he and other members of the republican party were corrupt, to assert and try to make people believe that the great mass of the republican party were dishonest or favor or defend such practices? I say it would not be. I will say no more about this, for these things have no business that I can see in this debate, and nothing would have provoked me to allude to it except that I heard things said in this debate of the democracy of New York that were entirely unwarranted and unjust. My colleague, after speaking of our effort to forbid by law the use of the Army at the polls and to get rid of supervisors and deputy marshals, said:

> But one truthful explanation can be made of this daring enterprise. It is a political, a partisan maneuver. It is a strike for party advantage. With a fair election and an honest count the democratic party cannot carry the country.

We think we did carry it at a fair election. We think we were beaten because there was not an honest count in certain States. He also says:

> These laws, if executed, insure some approach to a fair election. Therefore they—stand in the way, and therefore they are to be broken down.

That is the democrats—

I reflect upon no man's motives, but I believe that the sentiment which finds expression in the transaction now proceeding in the two Houses of Congress has its origin in the idea I have stated.

That is that we democrats are striving to repeal certain laws because, and only because, apparently, we believe that honest elections and an honest count will not be giving us the advantage. I believe no such thing. I do not want anything but an honest election and an honest count and a peaceful election, no matter whether my party wins or loses by it. He says further:

I believe that the managers and charioteers of the democratic party think that with a fair election and a fair count they cannot carry the State of New York.

That is an entire mistake. We carried New York in 1870 and in 1874; we carried New York in 1875; we carried New York in 1876; we carried New York in 1877. Each of those years we had either the election of a governor, State officers, or a presidential election, and each time we carried New York and we carried it by fair elections. He says:

They know that with free course, such as existed in 1868, to the ballot-box and count, no matter what majority may be given in that State where the green grass grows, the great cities will overbalance and swamp it.

Sir, we carried the election in 1870. Hoffman was elected governor the second time in 1870. I say that there may have been frauds in 1868 in the city of New York. I cannot gainsay it, but all my information is that there was not any extraordinary fraudulent voting; but if there was fraud it was that wicked fraud by which the canvassing officers, the creatures of Tweed, changed the result from what it really was, as it has been done elsewhere, as many believe. But my colleague said further:

This is a struggle for power. It is a fight for empire. It is a contrivance to clutch the National Government. That we believe; that I believe.

A struggle for power to have dishonest elections? No, sir; we struggle to preserve to the people the right and the power to have free elections, free from Federal power and Federal troops. In the State of New York, and in the Union, on a fair, peaceable, and free election we believe that we can succeed, and if we cannot we do not want to succeed. We have not got to the pass that we would destroy the Government by corruption and by violence to triumph in an election. When Senators talk about democrats violating the law and being violators of the law, I can point to marked violations of constitutional law in the State of New York by leading members of the republican party. I said the democracy carried the election in New York in 1870, in 1874, in 1875, in 1876, and in 1877. In 1878 there was no State election beyond the election of a judge. But we did not have a majority of the Legislature in both houses in any one of those years, and since 1875 we have complained because a reapportionment of the members of the Legislature has not been made. Our constitution declares as to the thirty-two senate districts:

An enumeration of the inhabitants of the State shall be taken under the direction of the Legislature in the year 1855, and at the end of every ten years thereafter; and the said districts shall be so altered by the Legislature at the first session after the return of every enumeration that each senate district shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants.

By our constitution new senate districts are to be made the first session after every State census, which was taken in 1855, 1865, and 1875. The constitution commands that the Legislature shall change the senate districts at the first session after each census. Until recently when the constitution was amended it did not apply to the assembly; that was done in another way; but in 1874 this provision was adopted:

The assembly shall consist of one hundred and twenty-eight members, elected for one year. The members of assembly shall be apportioned among the several counties of the State, by the Legislature, as nearly as may be, according to the number of their respective inhabitants, excluding aliens, and shall be chosen by single districts. The assembly districts shall remain as at present organized, until after the enumeration of the inhabitants of the State in the year 1875.

This is the amendment of 1874:

The Legislature, at its first session after the return of every enumeration, shall apportion the members of assembly among the several counties of the State, in manner aforesaid.

There was an enumeration in 1875. The census was then taken. The constitution commanded the Legislature which next assembled to apportion the senators and the members in districts and to the counties according to population. The republican majority of the Legislature refused to do so. They refused in 1876, in 1877, and in 1878. Each year there was a republican Legislature in session. The democrats who were there were eager to have the State apportioned, because although we had the popular vote in the State largely during all these elections yet we had not a fair representation of the people in the Legislature because the State was not fairly apportioned. The republicans had not apportioned the members, and that we say is the reason, and the only reason, why we are not able to elect a democratic Legislature of the State of New York and have a majority in each house. But I do not mean to charge that because these leading republicans, these legislators, have done what I think is a gross violation of their constitutional duty, the mass of the republicans in that State are dishonest men and would violate the constitution. Partisan feeling and partisan prejudice I think have swayed them. I know that a portion of the republican press and many republicans have called upon the Legislature year after year to apportion the State fairly according to the constitution, and they have not done it, except that they have passed a bill at the present session which I understand has become a law, although our friends say it is unfair and the governor allowed it to become a law but would not approve it because it was unjust and unfair in his judgment. It was the fairest bill that the republicans would pass even at this day.

Mr. President, this is not a debate merely to charge what the one party or the other has done which was reprehensible. We all regret, I hope, instances where the one party or the other have failed in their duty, but to say that the mass of either party have sunk to such a condition that we require the Federal Government to send the Army to keep the peace or to keep the citizens in order at the polls is not in my judgment true. We will have peaceable elections and fair and honest elections, because the mass of the men of both parties desire it, and will see to it whenever gross abuses occur they are corrected.

Sir, I have taken more time than I should, and yet I want to say a few words about supervisors and deputy marshals. I do not believe as the provision is on the statute-book now and as it is proposed to be enforced, that it is a wise measure and will secure fair elections. Such is human nature that these deputy marshals will always be of the party in power. They will be warm partisans, and they will use their power to get votes for their side and to embarrass their opponents; and they will strive to carry elections even contrary to the will of the majority of the people. This machinery clothes the supervisors and marshals with arbitrary power to arrest citizens and without process. Of course they will arrest according to their judgment, and they will be a very poor tribunal to decide these questions. I want to read one or two sections as specimens of the arbitrary power of deputy marshals, that they may be before the country. Take section 2022, and see the power that the statute gives these men to be exercised over the citizens without due or any process of law:

The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States.

There is authority to an executive officer, a deputy marshal, to arrest with or without process on election day any citizen that he judges is violating or about to violate or has violated the law. Section 2023 provides that:

Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States, for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States.

I read that because I desire to call the attention in a moment briefly to the manner in which citizens were dealt with by the commissioners on election day. They are to arrest with or without process. I ask Senators to look at section 5522, which provides that:

Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who by any of the means before mentioned hinders or prevents the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room, where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens, or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution.

This section subjects the parties interfering with the supervisors, with or without authority, to instant arrest. Who is to decide when a man commits an offense on election day for which he ought to be arrested? These very supervisors, these very marshals. When that is the case and these partisan men are clothed with Federal power to arrest and imprison, and have the right, as our opponents claim, to have the Army there to enforce their power over the citizens to arrest with or without process, where is the liberty of the citizen, where his protection from arbitrary power? I say that these marshals and supervisors will be always, under these laws, men who are strongly in sympathy with the political party in power, whichever party that may be.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he is not aware that in some sections the democrats asked to have marshals appointed from their party, and they were appointed? For instance, in Charleston, South Carolina, out of forty-six marshals appointed, is the Senator aware that eighteen of them were designated by the democratic candidate for Congress?

Mr. KERNAN. I was not aware of that, but very likely it is true.

Mr. TELLER. That is a fact, sworn to.

Mr. KERNAN. Very likely they wanted some protection against the army down there, possibly I suppose——

Mr. TELLER. There was not any army down there.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not know what the reason was. All I want to say to my friends on the other side, and I say it to my own friends, is, deceive not yourself. If you can have these deputy marshals without limit at the polls, if you can have these marshals at the polls, half of the supervisors and all the marshals being partisans of the party in power, you will not have a fair and free election by the voters of the opposition party for a very long time, in my opinion. See what a political organization this is; and I am speaking of it in no offensive sense. In 1878 the number of deputy marshals appointed for New York City was 1,260; (I have the report of the Attorney-General showing this, which was handed in a few days ago;) for the city of Brooklyn, 561. There were nearly two thousand deputy marshals in those two cities, only separated by the East River—a body of men who I doubt not were all of the republican party, and active partisan politicians. They were all paid out of the United States Treasury. Section 2031 provides for this, and is as follows:

SEC. 2031. There shall be allowed and paid to the chief supervisor, for his services as such officer, the following compensation, apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit-court commissioner: For filing and caring for every return, report, record, document, or other paper required to be filed by him under any of the preceding provisions, ten cents; for affixing a seal to any paper, record, report, or instrument, twenty cents; for entering and indexing the records of his office, fifteen cents per folio; and for arranging and transmitting to Congress, as provided for in section 2020, any report, statement, record, return, or examination, for each folio, fifteen cents; and for any copy thereof, or of any paper on file, a like sum. And there shall be allowed and paid to each supervisor of election, and each special deputy marshal who is appointed and performs his duty under the preceding provisions, compensation at the rate of $5 per day for each day he is actually on duty, not exceeding ten days; but no compensation shall be allowed, in any case, to supervisors of election, except to those appointed in cities or towns of twenty thousand or more inhabitants. And the fees of the chief supervisors shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, such accounts to be made out, verified, examined, and certified as in the case of accounts of commissioners, save that the examination or certificate required may be made by either the circuit or district judge.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator state in that connection how many voting places there were in those two cities?

Mr. KERNAN. I cannot state the number.

Mr. HOAR. Was there more than one appointed to a voting place, as a rule?

Mr. KERNAN. I do not know; but I will tell the Senator what I do know. I sat upon a committee of this body during the present session that investigated this question in reference to the city of Philadelphia. The marshal testified before the committee, and he was asked how many deputy marshals he appointed for that city, and the number was some seven hundred and seventy or seven hundred and eighty.

Mr. HOAR. There were between five and six hundred voting places.

Mr. KERNAN. I was going on to say, though I am not well informed as to that, that they do not send only one of these men to each poll. They pick out certain polls, I am told, where they send more, according to the necessities of the party there or some other rule.

Mr. McDONALD. There are six hundred and twenty-odd voting places in Philadelphia, and seven hundred and seventy-three deputy marshals were appointed.

Mr. HOAR. As the Senator from New York is stating that fact from the committee of which he and I are members, I will ask him if it was not also testified by substantially every democratic witness that they did not know and had no reason to believe that a single democrat failed to vote who was entitled to or wanted to vote, or that a single republican had attempted to vote who was not entitled to vote?

Mr. McDONALD. In every instance?

Mr. HOAR. It was the case substantially. Out of perhaps fifty witnesses there were one or two who thought it was very disagreeable to gentlemen to be in danger of being arrested for fraud, and they thought men did not go who would otherwise have gone; but that was substantially the entire testimony.

Mr. McDONALD. The whole testimony, however, was to this effect, that their duties on that day consisted in attending strictly at the polls and peddling republican tickets.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator will allow me to proceed. I was present when the marshal himself was sworn, and I was not present much else of the time. The marshal said he appointed that number of deputy marshals for Philadelphia, and he said they were all republicans. The question was put to him, Were they not what are called workers at the polls? He said he did not know that that was so, but he presumed a large portion of them were men who if they had not been deputy marshals would have been working republicans at the polls. I do not say that in any disrespect to the marshal; I am not fighting him; I am calling attention to what will always happen, that whichever political party has the Federal power it will under these laws appoint marshals and deputies of their own political side, and they will be men who will be a little more than ordinary workers at the polls, because they will have power to arrest Mr. KERNAN or any other man if he argues, as they think, a little too sharply against some voter's notions in reference to other men's right to vote. They will have too much power over the citizens.

Mr. HOAR. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. KERNAN. I shall have to decline, because I am taking too much time. Please allow me to go on unless the Senator wishes to put a short question.

Mr. HOAR. It will be a very short question.

Mr. KERNAN. Well, if it is a short question I will hear it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Senator whether that would not be also true if officers, whoever they were, were appointed by State or municipal authority? I ask the Senator whether there is any point in his argument, except as to whether the United States should have control of its elections or leave them to the States?

Mr. KERNAN. I have answered that question. My friend has not paid attention. I stated that by the laws of the State of New York the only men, the inspectors, who had authority at the polls must be, by the statute, two of one party and one of the other, and every voter in a voting district may on election day the year before vote for two men. Two will be elected by the dominant party; and the statute declares that the board of canvassers of that poll at that time shall name one voted for by the other party as the other man to make up the board of inspectors who receive votes and decide upon all questions and keep the peace at the polls.

Mr. HOAR. That relates to inspectors. The Senator was speaking of the police authority. Is that true of the police authority of New York?

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the Senator to allow me to go on. There is nothing in that question. Nobody is afraid of policemen in New York. The policeman is not clothed with power to arrest a man for making a face or shaking his fist at another, or anything of that kind. He is not authorized to arrest a man because he thinks he is casting a fraudulent vote. We enforce our laws not with the clubs of policemen or such subordinates but by indictments and punishments as a warning thereafter. I would no more allow our own police or State constables to have such power over the voters at the polls than I would allow the Federal officers, because they would be of the one party or the other, and they would be therefore dangerous to the rights of citizens of the other party. Do not mistake me. Believe me I will not ever assent to my own party having this arbitrary power through its officers over the electors at the polls, and give them the right to arrest citizens without process because they think the citizen is not a voter. Indictment and conviction is the remedy for fraudulent voting.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask just one question. How many convictions for illegal voting were there in 1868 in the city of New York? I suppose nobody denies but that there was quite a number of cases of illegal voting then.

Mr. KERNAN. I will come to that if the Senator will allow me to proceed. I ask why Davenport did not have them indicted for voting fraudulently in 1868? Why did he wait until 1878, and then arrest them all on election day and refuse to bail them unless they promised not to vote?

Mr. TELLER. Because we had no United States laws that were applicable at that time.

Mr. KERNAN. Men arrested swore that they had voted every year from 1868 down; that they had voted at the same place, and had registered at the same place. Mr. Davenport himself had the complaints sworn out months before the election of 1878 by his own clerk, to the amount of nine or ten thousand, but there never was a warrant issued or a man arrested until election day. While he arrested them and would not bail them unless they pledged themselves not to vote he never brought one of them to prosecution before the grand jury after the arrest on election day. Every man before the committee swore and said that he never heard of the matter after he pledged himself not to vote and gave his recognizance and went home and did not vote, although he had been voting ten years and believed he was entitled to vote; and they went home because they did not want to be kept twenty-four hours in prison as those were who would not make the pledge not to vote and to go home.

Mr. BUTLER. They were all democrats who were arrested.

Mr. KERNAN. I have an abstract here. Every one was a democrat who was arrested as far as I know, although one man I see swears according to the abstract that he was naturalized in 1868, and was a republican. His arrest was a mistake. But I do not want to go into that. I am trying to argue and not to charge harsh things, and not to arouse party feelings, but to appeal to all Americans who love liberty and wish to be protected by law and not be trodden down by arbitrary power, that we shall get rid of this scheme which with either party in power must give a power over the electors that is unjust, unwise, and ultimately will lead to the destruction of our form of government.

When I was interrupted I was saying that there were in New York twelve hundred and sixty deputy marshals. They got $5 a day, and I believe they could not be employed longer than ten days by law. Let our political opponents realize this; let us democrats be in power, let us be able to have a couple of thousand men in our employ in the cities of New York and Brooklyn on election day and for days before, paid out of the Treasury, all zealous democrats as yours are all zealous republicans. Is it not a mighty power to use to change the deliberate wishes and will of a majority of the electors, to change the result of the election?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. KERNAN. No; my clever friend from Colorado knows enough to answer himself. I decline to yield, but from no incivility to my friend.

All these were partisans, eager partisans, and yet you denounce us for insisting that neither political party should have this power, and above all we say neither party should have this power in reference to the use of the Army at the elections to encourage and aid marshals to make arbitrary arrests of the citizens.

Now I will take the very first witness called to show how this thing worked in 1878 in the city of New York. He was a Mr. Denning. But before I come to that let me say a word about what was read from the Cox report as to the election in New York City in 1876 by the Senator from Minnesota. I have that report here. In 1876 there was a fair election even under this Davenport law, and the report shows why; and yet in 1876, when Mr. Davenport said there was a fair election and when Mr. Cox reports there was, the democratic party carried the city of New York by fifty-two thousand majority. Yet they tell us here tauntingly that we want to get rid of supervisors and marshals, that we want to get rid of the Army, because the charioteers of the democratic party do not think they can carry New York with a fair election. Sir, with a fair election we can carry New York, not by fraud, not by force, but because a majority of the people of that State are opposed to some of the modern practices and principles of the republican party, and therefore we gain their votes by arguments, and they can only be taken from us by force or fraud, in my judgment. In 1876 Mr. Davenport himself allowed that the election was a fair one, as this report shows. He consulted gentlemen of the city of both parties and the city authorities and the police commissioners, and they asked him to unite with them in preventing fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting and in measures that should not annoy honest voters; and any gentleman who will get this report will find that the committee say that in that way, as Davenport acted in concert with the local authorities, it was an honest, fair election, and it was because there were no attempts to put in force the arbitrary and unjust practices that were resorted to by Davenport in New York City last year.

Gentlemen of each party formed a committee in 1876. They had officers all over the city, so that any man who attempted to violate the law, upon a sworn complaint there could be arrested on a warrant issued and brought right before the officer close by and bail required and given. If he gave bail and was a voter, he went and voted. They say that there were only three hundred arrests in 1876, and of those three hundred 90 per cent. were allowed to vote as legal voters after the examination. How was it in 1878? I want to give you specimens showing why the people complain of this law. Mr. Davenport in his testimony said that where the accused persons had not voted he required them to promise not to vote before he would discharge them. I will now read from the examination of Mr. Denning. (See page 3, Mis. Doc. No. 23, investigation of John I. Davenport:)

Question. What is your business?
Answer. Dry goods.
Q. Where do you do business?
A. With A. T. Stewart & Co.
Q. You are superintendent of the uptown store of A. T. Stewart & Co.?
A. Yes, sir; superintendent of the retail store.

He testifies he is superintendent of one of A. T. Stewart & Co.'s stores.

Q. How long have you been the superintendent of the store?
A. About ten years.
Q. How many men have you under your charge as superintendent of that store?
A. It ranges from five hundred to one thousand people.
Q. When did you come to America?
A. In 1860.
Q. How old were you at that time?
A. In the neighborhood of twenty or twenty-one years.
Q. When were you naturalized?
A. In November, 1868.

He then states who his witnesses were, that he had registered and voted every year since at the same place down to 1878.

Q. Tell the committee what happened when you went to register?
A. I registered in the same house that I always did, in Fourth avenue, near Tenth; I had been registered there all along. I have lived at No. 84 East Ninth street between six and seven years. The last week of October, I think about the 25th, I went to this same place that I had always been registered, and offered my name and address, &c., which was taken. As I was on the point of leaving the gentleman there said he would like to see my papers.

They made some question in regard to his papers.

Q. On election day you went to vote?
A. I went to vote. I walked out of the store without any overcoat on, the polling place being right next door. I went in and offered my vote. The gentleman there called to another person, who came up and told me that I was arrested.
Q. Did you have an opportunity to vote?
A. Oh, no. They would not let me vote. I had my ballot all ready, and presented it, but they would not allow it.
Q. Were you taken away?
A. Yes, sir; right off.

He was taken by an officer from up-town, miles from the post-office, down to Davenport's office, in the post-office building. He took with him Mr. Rice, the attorney of A. T. Stewart & Co., who offered to bail him. He was kept there for hours, and was finally allowed to go on bail only on condition that he pledged himself not to vote. I will take Mr. Davenport's own examination of him:

Q. You say that you were not allowed to go unless you promised not to vote. Did the question of bail arise at all?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did I refuse to take any bail?
A. The bail matter I believe was an after consideration.
Q. I ask you did I refuse to take any bail?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. If you had given bail you could have gone and voted, could you not?
A. No.
Q. Why not?
A. Because you said not; you further said that if I went and voted I would be liable to be rearrested.

He did not go and vote. He was not a friendless man, but a man who, if you read his evidence through, you will find was kept there, going from one to the other, with an attorney to look after him, for several hours, and went home then and did not vote, because he could not go unless he promised not to vote.

Now take another witness. I will not read all the testimony, but I have selected some of these as I have had time to look over the report. Here is a man, Adolph Zerrenner, who testified he would be thirty-seven years old on the 31st of the next July:

Question. When did you come to this country?
Answer. I came to this country in 1849.
Q. Then you were a boy when you came here?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you a soldier?
A. Yes, sir.

Then he shows how, under our law, being discharged honorably from the Army, he was naturalized in 1868, and then says that he went to vote:

Q. Did you offer to vote on election day?
A. The moment I came in to vote the supervisor said that he had a marshal for me.
Q. You mean that he had a warrant for you?
A. Yes, sir; he had a warrant for me. The moment I went to put the ticket in they arrested me
Q. Then you did not vote?
A. No, sir.
Q. Where did they take you to?
A. To the station-house, first at One hundredth street.
Q. Then they took you to the station-house?
A. Yes, sir; and from there to Manhattanville, and from there over to Harlem, and then it was evening.
Q. What became of you finally?
A. They asked me where I lived, and what my business was, and I told them that I didn't intend to stay all day long, because I had celery to take out before it spoiled; so I tried to get out, but they did not let me go.
Q. About what time did you get off?
A. I cannot tell you exactly the hour, but it was dark.
Q. Did your celery beds spoil?
A. All of them. Some of my friends told me that my wife was looking for me, but there was nobody there that took care of the stuff.
Q. And you lost your crop?
A. Yes; what I would have got out that day.
Q. You are a poor man, I suppose?
A. Yes, sir; I have to make my living by the celery business.
Q. What time were you arrested?
A. Two o'clock.
Q. And you were kept until after dark?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was there an attempt made by you to vote after you were discharged?
A. No, sir; they had me all over town, and I didn't get off till after the voting was over.

Now take another man, a Mr. Green. I will read you a little more of his testimony to show you how the thing was done:

Question. How old are you?
Answer. Thirty-four years old.
Q. Where do you reside?
A. At No. 554 Second avenue.
Q. You are a roundsman in the police?
A. Yes, sir; I am a roundsman, attached to the nineteenth police precinct.

My friends on the other side will see that our policemen could be interfered with if they dared to vote.

Q. How long have you been a roundsman?
A. Three years the 30th of next August.

This is under a non-partisan police board.

Q. When did you come to this country?
A. In 1866.
Q. How old were you then?
A. I was sixteen years old.
Q. You were naturalized in October, 1868?
A. Yes, sir; on the 5th day of October, 1868, in the superior court.
Q. Did you go to court with your witness?
A. I did, sir.
Q. As far as you know, your proceedings were regular?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where did you offer to vote on election day?
A. In the sixth election district of the eighteenth assembly district.
Q. How long had you voted in that district?
A. Nearly eight years.
Q. No objection had ever been made to your voting, had there?
A. No, sir.
Q. Just state what took place when you went to the polls to vote?
A. I procured my tickets at the ballot-boxes.
Q. You don't mean the ballot-boxes, you mean the boxes?
A. I mean the boxes in my district. I went to the polling district, and I handed my tickets to the supervisor, and he took the tickets——
Q. [Interposing.] Which supervisor, the democratic or republican supervisor?
A. The republican supervisor.
Q. What was his name?
A. His name was Lansing. He took the tickets and put them on the box. I think the whole of the tickets consisted of five, and when he took them he seemed to be excited. He put two tickets on the congressional box. He put the assembly and congressional tickets together, and he says, "There is a warrant for you. Mr. Green," and some one of the supervisors stepped down and handed a warrant for me to the marshal outside. I says, "Well, sir, do you object to my voting?" He says, "Yes." I says, "Fix your tickets properly on the boxes." He says, "They are fixed." I says, "No, sir; there is two tickets on the congressional box." He fixed the tickets right, and then I says, "You refuse to take my vote, do you?" He says, "Yes; there is a warrant for you, and I cannot take your vote." Then this fellow, the marshal, took hold of me and says he, "Mr. Green, I am sorry that I have to arrest you." I says, "You need not be."

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What time of day was this?
A. Between half past seven and twenty minutes to eight.

By Mr. WINGATE:

Q. Had you had your breakfast?
A. No, sir. The place where I intended to get my breakfast was a couple of blocks from the polling place, and I had intended, after depositing my vote, that I would go up and have breakfast.
Q. Were you in uniform?
A. I was; just as you see me now. I went up to republican headquarters between Thirtieth and Thirty-first streets on Fourth avenue.
Q. Was anything done on the way up?
A. Nothing more than that two or three of my friends came up and said that they would go my bail. Yes, sir, I remember now; when we got three or four blocks from the polls some fellows whom I had arrested and had caused to be sent to State's prison commenced hallooing and hooting after me.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you in the custody of the marshal?
A. Yes, sir; when we got to republican headquarters I knew a great many gentlemen there, and they asked me what was the matter. One gentleman who knew me very well came up to me and spoke to me, and I told him; and he says, "Here is a quarter; you take the cars and go down to the post-office building." I says to the gentleman in charge, "Can't you take bail for my appearance? I am a legal voter." He says, "No." Then I took a Fourth-avenue car and came down to the post-office building. There were a whole lot of men here. I wanted to get away as quickly as possible, and of course crowded my way through. My time being limited, I made my way up to the bar and explained the case to one of the men at the bar, and he said he would speak to Mr. Davenport, so that I would have no unnecessary delay.
Q. What time was it when you got down here?
A. About half past nine o'clock. Then Mr. Davenport recognized me and beckoned to me, and I came right around and produced my duplicate of my naturalization papers. The marshal came up, and says he, "The man is under arrest, Mr. Davenport." Mr. Davenport says, "Did he vote?" He says, "No, sir." I went up then and I says, "Mr. Commissioner, I am a legal voter; I do not see what right I have to be arrested." "Well," he says, "you have got 1868 papers." I says, "Yes, sir." "Well," he says, "how long have you been in this country?" I told him. "Well," he says, "you can go, but keep away from the polls." I says, "Can't I vote, sir?" He says, "No, sir." "Well, sir," says I, "if you have any doubt of my papers not being legal, if you will only send one of your marshals over to the superior court where I procured my papers he will find my name there on the records, and my witness's name is Thomas Keefe." He says, "I have something else to do besides sending my marshals around with you." Says I, "I cannot vote, then?" He says, "No, sir." I says, "Then you can use your own discretion as to what you will do with me, but I have a right to vote and I will vote." He turned upon me and says he, "Two thousand dollars bail; marshal, take him up to the third floor." I was taken up to the third floor, and when I got up there to this pen there I saw that there were about two hundred persons in there.
Q. Describe the pen.
A. Well, there were a good many poor wretches in that pen. It was a dirty, filthy sort of a place, and the smell was terrible.
Q. The place was filthy?
A. Yes, sir; the smell was awful anyhow. At the time the outside door was opened, and I got in, the smell was terrible.
Q. Well, state what you did there.
A. I got partly into the room, and I says to this marshal there—knowing him very well, because his brother was a partner of mine on the police force—"There is no need of your locking me up here." "Well," says he, "I will speak to the gate-keeper." He says to the gate-keeper, "There is no need of your locking this man up; his appearance is enough, he won't go away." I says, "I will sit out here." He says, "No, you cannot." He says, "The regular man who is detailed here has gone to his breakfast, and he left strict orders that when any one came up who was sent by Mr. Davenport they should be locked in." Well, I got partly inside the pen, and he was just closing the gate on me, and I says, "I will get out of here." I stood just like this, [illustrating,] and I says to this marshal, "Mr. McBride, can you go across the street with me, I want to get a friend to go my bail." He says, "I do not know what to do with you; let's go and see Davenport again." However, after a little persuasion, I got the marshal, who was with me, out from there, and we went to Nassau street to see a party who was not in, and from there he took me down to the National House, and there I procured bail. I came back again with my bondsman, and got in. Through the courtesy of a man there I was allowed to get up next to Mr. Davenport, so that I would not be delayed. It was then about half past ten o'clock. Mr. Davenport says, "The bail-bond is filed, and the bail is fixed at $2,000." I says, "Mr. Commissioner, can't I vote?" and he says, "No." I says, "I will vote." He says, "I will instruct the marshal to arrest you again if you do." I says, "I can't help it. I am entitled to vote, and I will vote." He says, "You will stick to it, will you?" I says, "Yes, I will stick to it." So my bail was taken, and Patrick Kavenaugh became my bondsman.
Q. Did you see anything of men in the pen?
A. Yes, sir; they were standing with their hands holding to the bars, looking out.
Q. With their faces between the bars?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How crowded was it?
A. There was hardly standing-room in it, it was so crowded. There was a board seat run around the wall, I should judge about ten inches wide; that is all I could see; I could see that from the end, where I was; there was no one sitting down because there was not room.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do I understand you that they were standing up in that pen?
A. They were all standing up; yes, sir.
Q. And the standing-room was full?
A. Yes, sir; so much so that when the gate was opened the crowd pushed against the gateman.
Q. What hour in the morning was that?
A. About ten o'clock.
Q. Did you vote on that day?
A. Yes, I did.
Q. Were you arrested for voting?
A. No, sir; when I went up to deposit my vote the marshal came up one way and I came up the other. I beat him there though, and had my tickets all right, and I got them in, and one of the supervisors says, "Well, what is the verdict from Mr. Davenport?" I says, "I don't know that that has anything to do with you." I says, "I am here to vote now." "Well," he says to two or three of the inspectors, "shall we take his vote?" I says, "Who is here to challenge my vote?" He says, "Well, what was done with you?" I says, "Two thousand dollars bail to answer." He says, "Well, we will have to take his vote." The vote was deposited. "Now," I says, "I reside two doors from here, and if I am not a legal voter, the marshal when he comes can come right up after me, and can arrest me for illegal voting."

By Mr. WINGATE:

Q. Have you ever heard anything more of the matter since?
A. No, sir. Just after I deposited my vote the marshal came up, but I was not arrested.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Has there been any proceeding against you, under your recognizance?
A. No, sir; I never heard anything more of the case since.

Patrick Wheelan sworn and examined.

By Mr. WINGATE:

Question. Where do you reside?
Answer. I reside at 363 First avenue.
Q. When did you come to this country?
A. In 1860.
Q. How old were you then?
A. Twenty years of age.
Q. When were you naturalized?
A. I took out my first papers in 1866.
Q. When did you take out your second papers?
A. In 1868.
Q. Did you go to court with your witness?
A. I did.
Q. As far as you know, your naturalization was legal, then?
A. Yes, sir; it was legal.
Q. Were you arrested on election day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What time in the morning?
A. About eight o'clock.
Q. Just state what was done with you.
A. I was taken to the Third avenue headquarters.

A. I do not know; it was some place on Third avenue, between Nineteenth and Twentieth streets.
Q. Was it the headquarters of any party?
A. Yes; it was the headquarters of the republican party.
Q. How long were you kept there?
A. Fifteen minutes.
Q. What was done with you then?
A. I was brought down here.
Q. Brought before Commissioner Deuel, were you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What action was taken on your case?
A. He paroled me to go, in case I would not attempt to vote. He said he would have to lock me up if I did not say I would not vote, and I said I would not.
Q. You promised you would not vote?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And he discharged you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you do?
A. I went up town and consulted a lawyer, and he said I had a right to vote, and I went and made an affidavit and voted, and then I was arrested and brought down here again.
Q. You were brought before Commissioner Deuel?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At the time when you appeared before Commissioner Deuel some lawyers appeared for you, did they not?
A. Not before Commissioner Deuel. I was sent before Commissioner Davenport then.
Q. Do you recollect that when you were brought before Commissioner Deuel Mr. Anderson and myself appeared for you, asked that you be admitted to bail; and do you recollect any conversation then about bail?
A. I do not recollect any conversation, only that Mr. Foley offered bail.
Q. What did Commissioner Deuel do?
A. I do not know. I know that I was locked up for two days.
Q. Do you recollect your being sent upstairs?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When you went up who went with you?
A. One of the marshals and a gentleman named Mr. Anderson, I think.
Q. And Mr. Foley?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What took place when you went upstairs?
A. I recollect going upstairs with Mr. Foley, and he offered bail, and it would not be taken.
Q. Where were you, back in the crowd, or in the inside of the bar?
A. Inside of the bar.
Q. Did Commissioner Davenport state anything about any reason why he would not take bail, or anything of that kind?
A. I think he said he would have to take twenty-four hours to consider it.
Q. Did he tell you that you had broken your promise?
A. Yes, sir; he did.
Q. Did he say anything about making an example of you?
A. I don't recollect that he did.
Q. How much bail were you held for?
A. Five thousand dollars.
Q. What was done with you then; where were you taken?
A. I was taken in a carriage to the Ludlow-street jail.
Q. Right away, or were you taken upstairs?
A. Right away.
Q. Were you taken upstairs at all from here?
A. No.
Q. From Commissioner Davenport's room?
A. I do not think I was.
Q. You were not put in the pen?
A. No; I was not put in the pen in this building.
Q. But you were put in Ludlow-street jail?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How long were you kept there?
A. From Tuesday afternoon till Thursday afternoon.
Q. Then your bail was accepted and you were discharged?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you ever heard anything about the matter since?
A. No, sir.

Arnold Lustig sworn and examined.

By Mr. WINGATE:

Question. Where do you reside?
Answer. Five hundred and eleven Fifth avenue.
Q. What is your business?
A. Well, I have no business; I deal in real estate.
Q. When did you come to this country?
A. I came to this country on the 13th of July, 1863, I think it was.
Q. How old were you then?
A. Nineteen years old.
Q. When did you declare your intentions?
A. I declared my first intention the 5th of March, 1866, and I took out my citizen paper on the 1st of November, 1868.
Q. Did you go in any court with your witness?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You were naturalized in the regular way, as far as you know?
A. Yes, sir. I wish it to be understood that I do not appear for any political party. I appear for my own grievances. I wish to make a statement.
Q. Make your statement.
A. I have registered in the same place for several years. When I came to register this last year a gentleman there wanted to take my papers. I told him that I would not give them to him. I was told then that if I would vote I would be arrested; and after I voted I was arrested.
Q. Who told you that?
A. This gentleman at the polls there. Before the election I came to Mr. Davenport and went before Judge Choate, and I saw Commissioner Deuel in this building. I own considerable property in New York, and I am dealing all the time in real estate, so I came to see Mr. Davenport. I had my tax bills in my pocket for $3,900 for the support of this city government. I told Mr. Davenport that, but he did not think that I was a citizen. I consulted a lawyer here and some gentlemen, and they all advised me that my papers were regular; that I had a perfect right to vote. But, nevertheless, I was arrested and taken before Commissioner Deuel, and he let me go on bail.
Q. What did Mr. Davenport tell you when you went to see him?
A. I asked him what I should do, and he would not give me any satisfaction. He says, "I have nothing to say on the subject," and he rushed out of the room.
Q. Did he tell you what was the matter with your papers?
A. No.
Q. He told you that they were void?
A. I do not know that he said that, but I understood him to say that if I was to attempt to vote on those papers I would be arrested.
Q. You say you went to a lawyer?
A. Yes; I went to a lawyer, and he said he thought my papers were regular and that some discrimination should be made between regular and fraudulent papers; but he said that Mr. Davenport thought differently, and cited the case of a gentleman who keeps a grocery store at the corner of Forty-second street and Third avenue, who was in the same position as myself and who took out new papers. The judge offered to naturalize me over again, but under the advice of my lawyers that I should not run any risk at all, I did not do it. I saw Judge Blatchford's decision and it coincided with what I was informed.

On page 328 you will find the following testimony of Matthew N. Cole:

Question. When you came to vote on election day what did you do?
Answer. I had no breakfast that morning; I thought I would be the first man at the polls and put in my ballot; but, however, the breakfast that I got was to be brought to an iron cage up here.
Q. When you went to vote just state what took place; what time was it in the morning?
A. It was between six and seven o'clock.
Q. What took place when you went to the polls?
A. I was more than surprised when they said they had a warrant against me to stop me from voting. I said I would swear in my vote; "I have taken an oath to tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and I will swear in my vote now. I think I have sworn so many times about it, it is well deserved, and I can cast my ballot," and then they struck me in the face and said I could not do it. An officer that was there, not a United States marshal, but some officer with brass buttons, a policeman—they said, "I want that man arrested." The policeman says, "I can't do it. The man is willing to swear in his vote and I can't lay a hand on him." With that the marshal went to work to coax me up, and said let me go down to John I. Davenport's and everything will be all right, when I would just state those words, the same as I had to them.
Q. Did you vote?
A. No, sir; I was not let vote.
Q. You were taken away; where were you taken to?
A. I was brought to Forty-seventh street before some kind of another committee, and they whispered something among themselves, and then they said I should be taken down to the post-office and go before Davenport, and there he would have it rectified.
Q. Where did you go from there?
A. Then I took the Third-avenue car, and they fetched me to this place. I was elevated up and elevated down. I was some time there suffering. I considered it a most mean and miserable act to keep me so long in an iron cage without any refreshment. I was hungry, without any breakfast.
Q. When you first came to the building where were you taken?
A. I was taken first to the court-room before Mr. Davenport. He was not there just exactly on the minute when I was fetched in as a prisoner. He was in a few minutes after that. I had to wait with his marshal, for he ordered that the uptown districts should be fetched before some other judge; I don't remember his name.
Q. Where did they take you?
A. They took me from this room that Mr. Davenport was in to another room before this judge.
Q. What did he do?
A. The judge asked me if I could find bonds and bail, and such like. I said yes; let me get out and I would find all the bail he wanted; and the reply was $2,500 bail. I was put under bonds of $2,500.
Q. You had not the bail there?
A. I had nobody there, and nobody in my district knew that I was even arrested.
Q. Where did they put you?
A. They took me to the iron cage. I had plenty of company there.
Q. How many persons were there in that cage at that time?
A. I should think there would be about forty-nine or close on to fifty.
Q. There was a crowd?
A. Yes, sir; we were so crowded that we could not put one foot past the other at that time.
Q. Was it dirty?
A. It was middling clean when we got into it, but it was very dirty when we left there.
Q. Were the men allowed to leave it to attend to the calls of nature?
A. No, sir; they had to take to the walls and the floor for it, just in the others' presence.
Q. How long were you kept in that place?
A. Some time in the afternoon I was taken out. They fetched me in a kind of hack or barouche, or some kind of a close carriage, to Ludlow-street jail.
Q. How long were you in that pen altogether?
A. I was there from that time in the morning; maybe it was about eight o'clock. Between going down town and all I should think it was getting close on to eight o'clock when I was locked up there, and I stayed there until some time in the afternoon; I could not exactly state what hour. I had no time before me.
Q. Did you have anything to eat or drink during that time?
A. Nothing.
Q. You were locked up all that night?
A. I was locked up in Ludlow-street jail for two nights and two days and a half.
Q. You were a laboring-man?
A. Yes, sir; I worked along shore.
Q. You have a wife and family?
A. I am the father of seven children.
Q. Did they know where you were?
A. They did not.
Q. What means did they have of support while you were in jail?
A. Very little support. Whatever I get, I get it very honestly.
Q. Did your wife and seven children suffer while you were in jail?
A. They did.
Q. They went without food?
A. Yes; they never have much. It is hard times for me on account of the family, for they are young and I have a great deal to do to get along in this world.
Q. Have you ever heard anything more of the charge made against you since election time?
A. Not since, sir.
Q. You have heard nothing of it since that time?
A. Of course I was brought out of Ludlow-street jail by the same marshal that brought me in there, and I was tried by some other parties here, and they let me go on condition that I would come back and give them up my citizen papers.
Q. You have not heard anything about it since?
A. I came here once and inquired. I believe, if they knew that they promised me that they would, as they say, make the old lamp good by giving me a good one for it, and that they would get my papers made all right for me from the year 1863. So he holds my papers. I have not got them yet.

But I will not weary the Senate with more evidence. The foregoing is a sample of a large amount of testimony taken before that committee. Warrants were sworn out by the thousand, the clerk of Mr. Davenport making the complaint. The parties complained of were never proceeded against until on that day at the polls they were arrested on warrants, not issued because they offered to vote that day, but warrants issued many weeks before because they had voted at prior elections, to be ready to stop their voting, as I say, and not to bring them to justice for having voted wrongfully. Each man swears that those who promised not to vote were allowed to go, and this one man who did vote was told if he did he would be arrested again, though he had given bail. None of them were proceeded against in the courts; no effort was made to punish them as an intimidation to men who might be disposed to violate the law.

Thus you see how this power can be abused, how it was abused; you see how it will wrong a great many men in a State of the Union the constitution of which says "unreasonable bail shall not be exacted." Here these laboring-men, for nearly all of them seem to have been industrious men of good character, the only allegation being that they were naturalized in 1868, though they had voted ever since, and yet for an offense of that kind $2,000 bail was exacted and of some more; but when they promised not to vote they were allowed to go on their own recognizance, and they never heard of the charge afterward. Shall these laws, this machinery to carry elections, be continued? Shall the Army be at the polls to aid in enforcing it? I hope for the sake of our country not.

Mr. President, I believe, and I submit it to my republican fellow-citizens, that we shall do a great wrong to ourselves, to our own Government, to our own fellow-citizens, we shall subject our own fellow-citizens to arbitrary power and to wrongful acts, if we allow any such system as this to be upon the statute-book and be put in force by those exercising Federal authority. I have no party feeling about it. I admit that such is human nature that we shall have abuses, no matter which party is in power. Each will select partisan men, and in their zeal they will try to carry elections by driving or trying to drive their opponents from the polls and by allowing their own men to vote, as was done in 1878. These men had voted for years. These laws had been in force for years. These warrants were sworn out long before election day. Why were not the men brought to trial in 1876, in 1877, in 1878 before the election, with a view to show that there was an earnestness in prosecuting men for illegal voting to deter them and others, and not a mere machine to drive eight or ten thousand men from the polls on election day, from the fear that they would be incarcerated, and from the fact that it would harass those who could not readily give large bail, and would put in jail those who could not for twenty-four hours at least. You will find in some of these cases where the men were incarcerated that the commissioner said he would consider the case twenty-four hours. I assume Mr. Davenport is no better and no worse than other men who will accept such positions. My objection is to the entire system of this unlimited number of deputies, to these supervisors with arbitrary power. So far as you have supervisors to watch and intimidate corrupt scoundrels by appearing there and saying, "We shall bear testimony against you if you vote illegally," I have no objection at all; but to clothe them with the authority to arrest on the instant with or without process, and to have marshals there to execute their bidding and to have the Army under the control of the Federal officers, active partisans, to bring the troops there to be under their orders on that day, in the name of American constitutional liberty protected and regulated by constitutional law, I protest against it. I am opposed to that system, and I believe we can in the future as in the past appeal to the honest citizens of both parties to keep the peace, to have honest elections and honest counts, and then our Government will grow stronger and stronger every day in the affections of our people and in the respect of the world, and we shall not have the abuses which we have had in some of our States where military power came around the Legislature and said who should go in and who must stay out, and where military power was around canvassing and returning boards, by their presence encouraging them, if they were bad men, to do bad things; but we shall have the old simplicity, the old local government of the people at the polls, who will see to it that there is peace, and they will prevent frauds by enforcing the laws on those who violate them.

This elaborate scheme authorizing supervisors and marshals to be at our voting places, clothed with arbitrary power over citizens, and the United States Army to be there to enforce this authority, will be dangerous to the liberties of our country, and must ultimately destroy our free Government. These arbitrary laws should be repealed or greatly modified. Our duty is to pass bills for this purpose. If they fail to become laws now because the President vetoes them, the remedy is with the people acting in their sovereign capacity at the ballot-box. To that tribunal, in my judgment, we can confidently appeal. This Government belongs to the people, and they will preserve it.

Mr. THURMAN, (Mr. BURNSIDE in the chair.) Mr. President, I wish to say something on this subject, but it will be very inconvenient for me to proceed to-night.

Mr. BECK. There are a few amendments that the committee have yet to offer and some that Senators wish to offer. If the Senator from Ohio will give way until the morning we may close these amendments to the bill before we adjourn to-night.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection to that if it can be the understanding that I shall be entitled to the floor in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BURNSIDE in the chair.) That will be the understanding.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will yield to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. I hope we shall be allowed to go on with the bill for at least half an hour or an hour.

The Committee on Appropriations, after looking over the bill as it has been passed, have no further amendments to offer as a committee; but representing that committee I have on one branch of the bill an amendment to offer. On page 70 of the bill, line 1699, I move to strike out the word "immediately," and on the same page, lines 1700 and 1701, to strike out the words "the $10,000,000 in legal-tender currency now in the United States Treasury, kept," and insert in lieu thereof "that portion of the legal-tender currency now in the United States Treasury held;" so that it will read:

In order to provide for the speedy payment of the arrearages of pensions, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue in payment thereof as they may be adjusted, that portion of the legal-tender currency now in the United States Treasury held as a special fund for the redemption of fractional currency under section 1 of joint resolution No. 17 of the Congress of the United States, approved July 22, 1876. And fractional currency presented for redemption shall be redeemed in any moneys in the Treasury at the time the same is presented.

Then the suggestion is made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and I think a proper one, to strike out, after the word "Treasury," in line 1707, the words "at the time the same is presented," and insert in lieu thereof "not otherwise appropriated."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky will be reported by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to make the clause read:

In order to provide for the speedy payment of the arrearages of pensions, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue in payment thereof as they may be adjusted, that portion of the legal-tender currency now in the United States Treasury held as a special fund for the redemption of fractional currency under section 1 of joint resolution No. 17 of the Congress of the United States, approved July 22, 1876. And fractional currency presented for redemption shall be redeemed in any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BECK. That is the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. Before the Senator from Kentucky leaves that part of the bill, there is another amendment that I think is a pertinent one and one which ought to be adopted. He has stricken out on line 1699 the word "immediately." Now I move to amend by inserting after the word "issue" in the same line the words "if necessary." I do not think there can be any reasonable objection to that. If this money is not needed for this purpose, of course it ought not to be used. The language in the text now is very mandatory. I conceive that there can be no disposition on the part of any side of the Senate to issue this fund unless it is made necessary by the emergency for paying out these pension arrearages. I ask the Senator if he will not accept that? If not, I shall ask a vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. BECK. I cannot accept that. It has been discussed a good deal, and after using the words "authorized and directed," on which I think the friends of this measure were very emphatic in their opinion, I think the insertion of the words "if necessary" would destroy the effect of the whole clause; at least it might destroy it; and therefore I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask to have the clause read once more as it now stands amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clause as amended will be reported by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read the clause of the bill from lines 1696 to 1708, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that the Senate will understand this. I do not desire to evade the issue. After having been beaten on this subject, I expect that this fund is to be used; but I do not desire that it shall be made the duty imperatively of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue this money unless it is absolutely needed. If he can use silver dollars or anything else, I shall prefer to let him have the authority to do so. I know, as all Senators know, that a very large sum has been saved or will be the present year by the exchange of our bonds bearing a higher rate of interest for four percents. I understand that this saving will be to the amount of some ten or twelve million dollars this year. If there is a possibility of the Secretary getting along by using for this purpose silver or anything else there may be in the Treasury instead of using this fund, why not allow him to do it? I hope there will be no opposition to the proposition I make, which is barely to obviate the necessity of directing the Secretary to issue this money unless it shall be necessary.

Mr. WITHERS. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if the effect of the adoption of his amendment will not leave it entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury whether he will use this money or not?

Mr. MORRILL. It will leave it in the discretion of the Secretary so that he can use silver or any other money in the Treasury, but he must use it for this purpose and not for any other purpose.

Mr. WITHERS. Judging of the future by the past, we know very well what his construction will be, and we wish to avoid it.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator if it will not leave it discretionary whether he uses it or postpones the payment of these pension arrears?

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, no.

Mr. TELLER. I am afraid it will be construed in that way at least.

Mr. BAYARD. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is entirely reasonable. The only object of the provision that came to us in the House bill was that in case there was no other money there to pay this large sum for the arrearages of pensions, then and in that event this $10,000,000, or what is left of it, which was set apart for a different purpose, should be paid out in order to meet the demand. That was the only professed intent; and the amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont preserves that. As the bill would read with his amendment it would stand thus, that this fund heretofore set apart for the redemption of fractional currency—and by the by this is the result of the sales of silver—shall be paid out to meet the arrears of pensions, if the same shall be necessary; that is to say, if there is no money from the ordinary revenues to meet it. It was that event and that only that the original proposition of the House intended to meet. Therefore, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is directly in the line of the professed meaning of the original proposition.

Mr. BECK. We just come back to the old contest. The Secretary of the Treasury advised us in a letter which was read yesterday that there is a deficiency in the revenues of the Government of $27,000,000, and the Committee on Finance, at the head of which was the Senator from Vermont and now the Senator from Delaware, introduced and sought to pass in the closing hours of the last session a bill to issue $18,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds. I will read the bill:

That in order to provide for the prompt payment of the arrears of pensions due to pensioners, or becoming due, under the provisions of the act approved January 25, A. D. 1879, granting and authorizing payment of arrears of pensions, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, 4 per cent. bonds of the United States, not exceeding in the aggregate $18,000,000, of the character, descriptions, and denominations, and with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, of the 4 per cent. bonds described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," or, in lieu thereof, or any portion thereof, to issue certificates of deposit of the denominations and character provided for in the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt," approved February 26, 1879; and the proceeds of the sale of such bonds, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied exclusively, and is hereby appropriated, to the payment of claims for arrears of pensions arising under said act of January 25, A. D. 1879.

The authority was absolute to issue the $18,000,000 bonds, and it was to apply such portion of it, after making the sale, as might be necessary to the payment of the arrears of pensions. After the Secretary showed us there was a deficit, after he has sought and the Committee on Finance have sought to urge us to issue $18,000,000 bonds, I for one at least do not propose to leave it to the Secretary whether it is necessary to keep the eight and a half millions of money now in the Treasury for which he has no other use, but propose to authorize and direct him as the House has done, and as the Senate I think yesterday by a clear majority of twelve intended, to use the money thus held for a purpose no longer needed, instead of issuing those bonds, and to help him get clear of the deficit which he claims to exist. In other words, Congress determines that this money shall be used, and does not leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury by any construction that he may put upon the law to determine whether he will continue to hold it or not. It is the same contest again.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky what the date of the letter is which he read?

Mr. BECK. The date of the letter is February 12, 1879.

Mr. PADDOCK. Three months ago.

Mr. BECK. But he had the receipts and expenditures before him. We have the fact staring us in the face and reported by the Secretary on the 1st day of April, that he had increased the bonded debt of the country $300,000,000 in the last three years, and is now paying $102,000,000 interest, 6 per cent. upon three hundred million dollars and odd as well as 4 per cent. in addition to that on the same sum, and that the emergency had required the sale of bonds and the double interest he has been paying——

Mr. ALLISON. Has he not saved $11,000,000 of interest?

Mr. BECK. I think ultimately he will save interest; I do not say $11,000,000 but a considerable amount. I will say, however, that in order to do that and for this immediate emergency he did increase the bonded debt from what it was three years ago $300,000,000 and when the people were seeking to take his 4 per cent. bonds at par he paid, in order to increase the public debt, a half per cent. commission to the syndicate, being a million and a half upon the $300,000,000 and three months' interest upon the 6 per cent. bonds, which was 1½ per cent. more—a million and a half of dollars of commissions to the favored syndicate and four and a half millions being the interest for three months upon the six percents which were bearing interest after the four percents substituted for them were issued.

Thus a few friends in New York and elsewhere pocketed $6,000,000 by the transaction, when all of these bonds in a very brief time would have been taken by the people of the country without either the double interest or the commission; and hence the grab to seize them by the thus favored bankers. That is the truth.

Mr. PADDOCK. I made the inquiry I did of the Senator because to-day I saw the Secretary of the Treasury here, and had a conversation with him on this subject; he expressed it as his opinion that this legislation which the Senator from Kentucky insists upon would not hasten the payment of the arrears of pensions by a single day; that he would be able, so fast as the accounts should be reported to him in the regular routine of business through the Pension Office, to pay them. Therefore the legislation is wholly unnecessary so far as the soldier is concerned; and if this plea is interposed on behalf of the soldier, it is a false plea; there is no sense in it, no propriety in it, no truth in it, as the Secretary expressed himself in regard to his ability and his intention; and these reflections upon the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to this particular matter are certainly not warranted by the facts, not warranted by his conduct heretofore in regard to it.

Mr. BECK. I am not making any particular charges against the Secretary.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not understand what the Senator is doing if he is not making at every breath a statement derogatory to the character and action of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to this particular matter and in regard to the general financial programme which he has sought honestly, as I believe, to carry out, and which he has carried through to this date with very great success, ay, sir, with wonderful, with most remarkable success. Indeed, I do not hesitate to say that the results already secured under the present administration of the Treasury form one of the brightest and grandest pages of our history.

Mr. BECK. It is very well for gentlemen on the floor to boast about their Secretary. He is a great man now, and may be a greater one.

Mr. PADDOCK. As far as I am concerned, I make no boasts about the Secretary of the Treasury. I only claim for him that he has done his duty and that he is entitled, as every man high or low is, to fair treatment. Whoever strives as he has striven to do his full duty faithfully and fearlessly and well is entitled to have it said of him that he has so done; he ought to receive the meed of praise that the fair and generous always accord to well-doing. I am no special champion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Perhaps if I should speak my own personal feelings I might indicate other preferences before him in some respects.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of the Treasury, in the letter to which I referred, showed us that it required thirty-four millions to pay the arrearages of pensions then due and passed upon; that it would require $2,500,000 more to pay those to be passed upon during the current year; that it would require five million more to pay those that would be acted upon during the next fiscal year for which we are now providing; making $41,500,000 to be paid altogether; and we were induced by reason of the deficit which he said must exist in the Treasury of $41,500,000 to limit appropriations for the arrears of pensions from now on to the close of the next fiscal year to $25,000,000, as shown by the act approved March 3, 1879, which I hold in my hand.

Thus it appears, in view of his own statement of the amount required to pay these arrears of pensions, in view of the deficiency which he said would exist, in view of the action taken by the Finance Committee of the Senate seeking to get us to issue $18,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds, that it is time for the Senate and the House to direct that Secretary to use the money now in the Treasury and belonging to the people to pay off the arrears of pensions peremptorily, instead of issuing the bonds he seeks to have issued, and thereby diminish the deficit which he says exists, and pay the men who are entitled to this money, for they are all entitled equally. If there are $41,000,000 owing, as the authorities all say there will be, then the twenty-five millions appropriated cannot be distributed pro rata, but some must be left out and some must be favored. We are seeking to put means into his hands to enable him, as nearly as he can, to pay them all, and we do not intend to leave it to his discretion unless we are voted down in the Senate. Those who agree with me propose to order him to use this money.

In all our communications with the Secretary we direct him; we do not request him. When we pass laws, they are not laws to be executed by him or not as he sees fit. He is doing that in a good many ways now; but if I should go into that it would involve a discussion over again. He is neither using the sinking fund according to law, nor is he using it for any purpose except to subserve his own convenience in purchasing a few legal-tenders and fractional currency. He is receiving greenbacks for customs dues, and does not want Congress to pass a law to authorize him to do it. He is increasing the bonded debt as he pleases, under a construction of his own that after resumption is accomplished he has a right to go on and do whatever he thinks is necessary to maintain resumption. He is doing a great many things in regard to which it is very well to let the Secretary understand that this is the body to pass laws, and that he as an executive officer must obey them, and that we do not submit to his discretion; he obeys our orders.

Mr. MORRILL. I had no idea that the amendment I proposed would meet with the slightest opposition. It was a plain proposition in relation to the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, differing now in opinion from the opinions he held three or four months ago. Of course, that is easily explained. The Commissioner of Pensions ascertains that he cannot adjust so large an amount as the entire arrears of pensions which are required in a single month, and therefore the sum which will be required for the arrears of pensions, while not diminished in the aggregate, will be spread over a longer period of time.

Now, when the Senator from Kentucky assails the action of the Secretary in his funding arrangements, let me say to him that the Secretary has proceeded exactly according to law. He has paid no more interest than the law of Congress authorizes and even directs that he shall pay. Whenever the Senator calls attention to the management of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the funding process, in my judgment he is doing the Secretary a great favor.

It appears that the Senator from Kentucky is in favor of authorizing the Secretary to use this fund when it is necessary and directing him to use it when it is not necessary. That is the only point I wish to remedy. I merely desire to place it in the power of the Secretary to use this if it is necessary, and not otherwise.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont prevails this eight and a half million dollars will continue locked up in the Treasury. When this subject was under discussion at the last session of Congress the Secretary of the Treasury submitted a communication directly to the Senate. I was then chairman of the Committee on Pensions and the matter was called particularly to my attention. In that communication he stated that unless there was a specific appropriation made for the purpose of paying the arrears of pensions the great additional burden imposed upon the Treasury by that bill would cause a deficiency of not less than $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. He also stated in that communication, what has not been referred to in this debate, that he felt himself called upon, under the provisions of the law of January 14, 1875, to hold in the Treasury as a specific fund for the purpose of maintaining resumption not less than 40 per cent. of the entire amount of legal-tender notes in circulation.

Now, sir, the last public-debt statement shows that there was in circulation of legal-tender currency on the 1st of May $346,742,631. Therefore under the statement that the Secretary made to the Senate he is holding to-day as a fund for the redemption of that amount under the law of 1875 the sum of $138,677,052, which, added to this amount unnecessarily held in the Treasury for the redemption of fractional currency, makes over $146,000,000, which is in excess of what is shown to be the available cash balance by that debt statement.

I believe that the declaration of the Secretary that he felt himself authorized to retain that 40 per cent. is arbitrary and without warrant of law, and that we ought to realize all that experience shows is not necessary for the purpose of maintaining resumption. I believe that the amount this bill provides for ought to be put into circulation; it ought to be earning something; it ought to be at work like all the other capital of the country; and therefore I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont will not prevail. I would make it mandatory upon the Secretary to use this amount so unnecessarily held.

Mr. TELLER. Senators say there will be no deficiency in the revenue, and that too in the face of the statement sent here by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 12th day of February, when all the facts here to-day in respect to the finances of the United States, or at least all the favorable facts, were just exactly as they are now. In the last communication we have had from the Secretary with reference to the pension bill, after it passed the House, he declared there would be a deficiency in the revenue; he declared it by implication and declared it directly; and he asks now, would it not be better to sell bonds to meet it, instead of taking this money lying idle in the Treasury?

Senators say that if this money is not appropriated the pensioners will be paid, and that, too, in the face of the letter of the Secretary read by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in which he declared that a million and a quarter had been already paid and a million and a quarter more would be paid during this fiscal year, and hereafter it was supposed they could pay about two million dollars a month. Does any Senator think it is going to take fifteen months yet to determine who are entitled to these arrears of pensions?

Mr. PADDOCK. What does the Senator mean by "hereafter?"

Mr. TELLER. I say that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury yesterday, in which the Secretary stated that it would take eleven months beyond the end of this fiscal year to pay these pensioners. The excuse that I understand Senators to make for accepting that is that the office cannot pass sooner upon and determine the pension applications. Forty thousand men have sent here their claims for arrears of pensions that ought to be determined in the next thirty days, and those forty thousand men are waiting for their money, and the Government keeps it locked up; and yet we are told that we can meet these men, who deserve it if any men ever did, and justify the keeping of the money locked up under the supposition that it is barely possible—it is improbable, I say—that the revenues may so increase that they may be paid in thirteen or fifteen months from now.

I do not mean to meet any of my constituents who have fought in the war and entitled themselves to this money that we have voted to pay, an honest and honorable obligation on the part of the Government—I do not mean to meet any of my constituents with that kind of an answer to his claim. When I have the money, I pay my debts; and when the Government has the money, as far as my vote will go, it shall pay its debts.

Mr. PADDOCK. I would like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he is able to state that these accounts can be reported from the Pension Office so rapidly that $2,000,000 a month will not answer the demand of all the requisitions upon the Treasury therefor?

Mr. TELLER. I am not able to say as to the amount.

Mr. PADDOCK. Allow me a moment. I understood the Secretary to say that after the present month the Department will be able to respond from the general revenues in the sum of $2,000,000 a month for these payments. That is the reason I inquired of the Senator what he meant by the use of the word "hereafter," and if he did not himself think that that is as rapidly as the accounts can be reported to the Secretary of the Treasury from the Pension Office for payment by the Treasury?

Mr. TELLER. Having had some little knowledge of business for twenty-five years, I say it is the veriest bosh in the world to assert that they cannot pass upon these claims so as to pay more than $2,000,000 a month. I say in thirty days they ought to pass upon the claims of the forty thousand already filed. The law has fixed everything except the identity of the men. That does not require much examination; and the forty thousand who have sent in their applications (and it may be all that are coming, but probably not,) can have their claims soon disposed of, and that will require more than the money they propose to pay in the way they propose to pay it.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether I understood him aright to say that the Secretary of the Treasury had stated to-day that these claims cannot be adjusted at the rate of more than $2,000,000 a month.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understood him to express the opinion that the payments made at the rate of $2,000,000 a month would meet all demands from the Pension Office, the demands possible to be made under the regular routine of business with the clerical force they have or can advantageously employ in that office. That was the impression I got from what he said, and it is the impression I have had all the way through, and but for that impression I should have gone for this measure. I do not believe, I have not believed from the first, that this proposition would advance the payment a single day of a single pension so far as the arrears are concerned.

Mr. PENDLETON. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska also when he had that conversation with the Secretary, and that without meaning in the least degree to ask questions that are not entirely proper in this discussion?

Mr. PADDOCK. What is the question?

Mr. PENDLETON. The question was whether I might ask, without any offense whatever, (which I do not intend,) from the Senator from Nebraska when and where he had that conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury to-day.

Mr. PADDOCK. If that is pertinent and important to this general inquiry, I shall be very glad to answer it, and I do not hesitate to do it as it is. I met the Secretary of the Treasury here to-day. I met him in this Chamber, or perhaps in the cloak-room, and had some conversation with or rather I interrogated him on this subject. It saved me the necessity of going to his office to make the inquiry which I had proposed making, because I had gotten this impression before, and I was confirmed in the impression from what he said in answer to the questions I propounded.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say that the last communication I know of—and I am not very well informed about the matter and possibly may be mistaken—from the Secretary of the Treasury, officially given to Congress, was on the 12th day of February last, in which he made the statement under his own signature that in order to pay these arrears of pensions there must be either additional taxation or an additional sale of bonds. If there has been any other official communication to Congress——

Mr. PADDOCK. Allowing that to be the case, is the Senator prepared to state that the financial conditions are exactly the same to-day as they were then?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir, I am not prepared to state that they are exactly the same; but this I am prepared to state, that if there has been any change whatever in the financial condition of the Treasury it ought to have been made known to this and the other House officially under the signature of the Secretary, and not by what I have heretofore complained of, private conversations upon the floor of the Senate or in the cloak-room.

I rose for the mere purpose, not of controverting anything that the Secretary said to the Senator or that the Senator may have received from the Secretary, but of showing that official communications from the Departments to this Senate upon which they are supposed to act, are not made so clearly, so authoritatively as they ought to be; and here is an illustration of the great benefit we should derive from the personal explanations of the Secretary as to the condition of the Treasury and the necessity of appropriations, as I have claimed.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am very glad to have given the Senator the opportunity to emphasize his theory in regard to communications from the Executive Departments.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I have no doubt he would always be gratified to do a kindly and proper thing of that sort in his senatorial action upon the floor. Now, I do not know, I do not profess to know as well as many other gentlemen here, whether or not it is necessary to pass this clause of the bill in order to accomplish the purpose we have of paying these pension arrears without increasing either the taxation or the sale of the bonds of the Government; but I do desire to call attention to the fact that the last official communication which has been had from the Treasury Department to Congress shows that it is necessary either to do the one or the other, to increase the taxation or increase the bonded debt. I am in favor of neither. I am in favor of using this hoarded fund in the Treasury for these purposes, but I have been content to leave that subject on the discussion of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and other gentlemen upon both sides of the Chamber, until I heard a statement made that, in contravention of the written report made to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury, we had other, unofficial, private communications made that seemed to override that official statement. It was not for the purpose of questioning anything that the Senator from Nebraska had said, but merely to call attention to the fact that on this very day in this Senate Chamber the head of a Department had seen fit personally, privately to come upon the floor of the Senate and communicate with Senators upon the matter now pending before them, in order that I might accomplish, if it is possible, what I think a great reform, which shall require that that information be given publicly to every member who sits here rather than to any member on either side of the Chamber (and in this instance it was given to persons on both sides) in derogation of his written and official report.

Mr. PADDOCK. The criticism of the Senator upon the Secretary of the Treasury, based upon what I have said, is certainly very extravagant——

Mr. PENDLETON. The Senator will see that I make no criticism.

Mr. PADDOCK. The inference from what the Senator says is that the Secretary came upon the floor and communicated these things himself voluntarily with the view of influencing legislation. That is not the truth at all, sir, so far as my knowledge goes. The truth is simply this, that the Secretary of the Treasury being here, as he had a right to be, and I, having had no other opportunity to make inquiry of him concerning this matter, propounded to him a question or two as a Senator of the United States, and it was proper and right that he should answer such questions as I put them to him, and it was proper and right that I should communicate to the Senate such views and impressions as I got myself from the answers to those interrogatories by the Secretary of the Treasury, the question of courtesy which my friend has raised to the contrary notwithstanding. The interview was of my own seeking; the Secretary was in no respect responsible for it; and in this discussion I gave my own views and impressions as simply fortified and strengthened by what he had said to me. In view of what had been so freely said here I felt that I was fully warranted in doing this in justice to all concerned.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly I was not questioning in any degree either the right of the Secretary of the Treasury to come here or the right of the Senator to have a conversation with him in relation to public affairs.

Mr. PADDOCK. The inference from the Senator's remarks is entirely that way.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is for gentlemen to draw inferences, and not myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have a suggestion to make which I think will relieve us all of this difficulty. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to put his bill for requiring the Secretaries to be here present and subject to our inquiries, right on to this legislative appropriation bill, and tell the President of the United States and "all the rest of mankind" that the Government shall not go on until we get that great reform accomplished. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENDLETON. The Senator from Vermont is very kind in making that suggestion. Undoubtedly he does it in the interest of the public. Will he vote for it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will as soon as I will vote for the other methods. If I am with my honorable friend in the other methods, I am for that.

Mr. PENDLETON. If you will aid me in doing that, I will introduce the amendment immediately,

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand my friend thinks it is a thing that ought to be done, and that it ought to be carried on to an appropriation bill, and that the operations of Government should stop until he can coerce the minority of the Senate and the House of Representatives and "the rest of mankind" (if I do not improperly allude to the President by that expression) into agreeing that this great reform must begin now before the Government goes any further.

Mr. PENDLETON. Surely I could not suppose that the Senator from Vermont meant to make a suggestion except that which he considered of great public importance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would make one of great public importance, but my honorable friends on the other side would carry out their own theories certainly.

Mr. PENDLETON. Timeo Danaos.

Mr. BECK. In addition to what the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] said, I desire only to remark that the Congress of the United States not only desires that all these payments should be made very promptly, but on the 3d of March, 1879, in the same act by which we appropriated the money to pay the arrears of pension, we added:

For temporary clerks in the Pension Office, and for furniture, rent of additional rooms, and other contingencies, $52,200, in addition to the appropriations which have been or shall be made under other acts, the same to be available until June 30, 1880—

The close of the next fiscal year—

Provided, That no more than $3,500 shall be used for furniture, contingencies, and rent.

Leaving over $48,000 to be applied to aid in enabling the Commissioner of Pensions to have these arrearages paid promptly, and we allowed him for the current fiscal year forty more clerks than he ever had before. We have allowed him for the next fiscal year to retain twenty-six of the additional forty. In addition to the $50,000 we have given him we have increased the force in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, so as to hear appeals, ten additional clerks. Then, with $48,000 for clerical force to work on the arrears of pensions cases, with twenty-six more clerks than he ever had for the next year, with ten more in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, Congress has shown every disposition to have these moneys paid as promptly as possible.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he has any official or other authentic information which will enable him to inform the Senate of the amount of claims which can be now disposed of by the Pension Office per month with its present force?

Mr. BECK. I have no other information except what the Secretary furnished us, that by the close of the next fiscal year there will be $41,000,000 necessary to be paid, and we have furnished the Commissioner of Pensions with money enough, at a thousand dollars a year, to employ forty-eight clerks, and we have allowed him to retain for next year twenty-six more than he ever had before until this fiscal year, and we have given the Secretary of the Interior ten more than he had, for the very purpose of enabling all these cases to be worked up during the next fiscal year. We think we have given a force sufficient to enable it to be done.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I do not propose to go into a discussion of the merits of the provision that has come here from the House, but I do not, so far as I am concerned, propose to see a proposition which was so well made as that of the Senator from Ohio disposed of in the manner which has been attempted on the other side of the Chamber. The Senator from Vermont proposes that it shall be attached to this appropriation bill which is before the Senate. The proposition of the Senator from Ohio is that members of the Cabinet when they desire to communicate with the Senate or House shall do it officially and under certain responsibilities. The Senator from Nebraska says that the Secretary of the Treasury happening to be here to-day he met him, perhaps in the cloak-room or some place on the floor of the Senate, and received this communication, which he happened likewise to give to the Senate, and thereby the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury happened to be brought to bear upon the Senate of the United States.

I saw—and I take the liberty which the Senator from Nebraska has taken—I happened to see the Secretary of the Treasury to-day canvassing on that side of the Chamber, and I happened to see Senators with whom he spoke come over here, and I happened to see the Secretary of the Treasury come over here and speak with leading members of the Committee on Appropriations; and, so far as circumstantial evidence can go, it is a proven fact that he was here electioneering in regard to this matter, because immediately after his conversation with prominent Senators, I know what their views were. I say here that if this back-door and cloak-room influence is to be constantly brought to bear upon us, the sooner the bill proposed a few days ago and so ably advocated by the Senator from Ohio becomes a law the better. This surreptitious sort of "happening in" to control legislation is beneath contempt. If a member of the Cabinet is not willing to take his share of responsibility for his views, let him keep away from here. We are surely his peers. We do not want to see Cabinet officers dart in at one door and out at the next and leave a trail behind for somebody to explain. I witnessed once in the House of Representatives a movement on the part of the Senator from Ohio, then a member of the House, chase from the floor a Secretary of the Treasury. I mean no pun by this use of words, for it was Mr. Fessenden, not Mr. Chase. The proposition was that he give the House in a responsible manner officially and in open day what he was peddling over the floor of his views. I say the same here.

The Senate of the United States should resent this attempt of the Secretary of the Treasury to come here with this back-stairs influence, this sort of royal whispering and whipping-in on the floor of Parliament, or as the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] aptly remarks, drumming up his recruits and converting people to his opinions.

I have witnessed nothing that has had such an influence to convert me, and I think every other fair-minded man, to the support of the bill offered some weeks ago by the Senator from Ohio, as the operations of this afternoon.

Yesterday afternoon we as the representatives of the people who are behind us voted that some eight or ten millions of an idle, inactive, and not useful currency lying in the Treasury should be liberated, put upon its travels to discharge its duty among the people, instead of increasing our interest-bearing debt; and to-day the soft, velvety step of the Secretary of the Treasury is all around these corridors electioneering and whispering. Let him say what he has got to say openly, or let him stay where he belongs. We do not want him here. That is what I was trying to say in response to the jeer of the Senator from Vermont that the Senator from Ohio had better tack his bill, a great bill of reform that he has introduced into this body, as a rider to this appropriation bill. I understand the meaning of that; but the matter cannot be disposed of in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The honorable Senator from Indiana has, with his usual ingenuity, greatly misunderstood me. I was not jeering at the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, which certainly is entitled to grave consideration. There are many aspects in which what he has said appears to me to be perfectly demonstrable. There are countervailing considerations which make it doubtful whether under the Constitution and our structure of government, it could be done. The thing I was calling the attention of the Senate to was that if this measure of the Senator from Ohio was, as he thinks it to be, a measure of reform for the public interest, then on the principle the other side of this Chamber is proceeding upon in respect of other great measures of reform, as they think, respecting the public interest, the quickest way of accomplishing it would be to put it on this bill, and to tell the House of Representatives, if they do not happen to think that way, that there shall not be any appropriations to carry on this Government until they agree to it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Does the Senator think that is the quickest way?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the the theory of my honorable friends.

Mr. VOORHEES. On your theory? I ask as to your theory, not mine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not speaking of my theory.

Mr. VOORHEES. On your theory would it not be the slowest way?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not any theories, Mr. President; I am only trying to make my humble contribution to the rapidity of the revolutions of the revolutionary wheel that my honorable friend and his associates have set in motion; and I say the wheel will revolve faster if you put more weight on its outside edge by further reforms so as to get so many reforms gathered together that the House of Representatives and the President and "the rest of mankind" cannot fail to be swept into an agreement. That is the thing to do.

Mr. VOORHEES. There is not a single measure we have proposed as riders, so called, upon the legislation of the extra session of Congress but what calls for the appropriation of money to carry it out. Consequently we connect it with the appropriation bills. That is to say, we tell you if you want to use the Army for political purposes, to carry elections, we do not mean to pay money for that use. If you propose to surround the polls on election day with the Army and Navy to suppress the expression of the free choice of the people, I do not want to vote money for them to be used in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither do we want it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will not vote money for that purpose. Again, in the bill now pending, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, we say to that side of the Chamber if you desire to employ supervisors to stand as spies and inspectors upon honest men while they are doing their voting, we do not want such persons paid by this appropriation of the money of the people whom we represent.

The proposition of the Senator from Ohio, however, comes here as an independent measure, having no connection with the subject-matter of the pending bill. I insist that the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont that it should be attached to an appropriation bill was in the nature of a jeer on its merits.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am fully up with the Senator from Indiana against having soldiers go to any elections to prevent any honest man from voting, or to regulate the method of his voting or to do any other thing of that character; but I do not appear to be with the Senator from Indiana in, whenever it cannot otherwise be done, having the citizen soldier of the United States go to the polls to protect honest men and honest officers against the thugs and assassins and mobs and red-shirted armed bands who in various places have hitherto, and probably will again, undertake to overthrow the liberties of the people by armed force.

Mr. VOORHEES. Who is the judge of who is an honest man?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am the judge, so far as my vote goes, if the honorable Senator will allow me to go on.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So far as my vote goes I am the judge.

Mr. VOORHEES. So am I.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So the Senator is; but he judges one way, that he would have riot and free ruin and I do not know but free rum at the elections on one side, while I whould have peace and order and fair play; and if it cannot be preserved in any other way, I would have the strength of the people by its arms preserve it.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the honorable Senator from Vermont means to state as a fact that I would be in favor of a free riot and disorder, he does himself gross injustice as a Senator on this floor. I am not at liberty to make a further response than that. I might say hard things in reply; that he was in favor of military usurpation and violence by the Army. I asked him a proper question in a legislative body, and that was who was to judge? He said that he was in favor of the use of the Army and the Navy to secure the rights of honest voters as against those who were dishonest. That was the substance of his remark. I asked him who was to judge. He said he judged. I said I did too, and he said yes, that I judged in favor of those who were for free riot, murder, and kindred crimes. I hope the Senator from Vermont will see that that was not a proper reply to make in this place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I accept with due humility the rebuke of my honorable friend from Indiana; but what I said was not so strong by its implications in the direction that he indicates as what he had just said before was as it respected what myself and my associates on this side were for. He intimated that we were all in favor of interfering with the freedom of elections at the point of the bayonet to sustain spies and other disreputable people in exercising a coercive surveillance over the exercise by honest men of their freedom of voting. That was the substance of what the honorable Senator said. He had a right to say it in the sense that that would be the consequence of our maintaining the legislation that now exists. I suppose he thinks so; I am bound to suppose he does. Now, I say in return and in exactly the same spirit, because I was not offended at what he said; he only spoke of the consequences;—I say in exactly the same spirit and in the same way that the course he is pursuing, as its inevitable consequences, has the character of supporting, without defense of law, whatever of riot and armed interference with liberty mobs and organized ruffians may choose to set up on election day, and say to the executive officers of the law that they shall have no power to suppress it then. That is the consequence.

Now, we will come back to the question, Mr. President, as to what sort of rider this is, on an appropriation bill or on the Army bill. What sort of rider is it? The honorable Senator says that it only regulates the expenditure of money. Does the repeal of ten or fifteen or twenty sections of the Revised Statutes regulate the expenditure of money by wiping off from the statute-books what already stands there as independent legislation on an independent topic? You might just as well say, with more force you might say that these improvements, as the Senators think they are, in respect of administering the Department of the Treasury, shall be passed in spite of everything, for the reason that this legislative bill contains an appropriation to pay the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury. You may say, therefore, "We will not pay the salary of any Secretary of the Treasury until we get all the laws of finance regulated exactly to suit us, because the public interest requires it; and no Secretary of the Treasury shall receive a dollar of public money to pay himself until we shall have got the President of the United States and the other House to assent to such changes of the law respecting his duties, if he is to perform them, as are agreeable to us." That is the logic of it; and that is the kind of logic which I hope the Senators will stick to until they are satisfied either that the country, which ultimately will settle all these things, is going to sustain them, or that it is not.

No, Mr. President, it is impossible to escape from the statement that has been made, that if you can put with propriety on this appropriation bill the riders that are now there,—I do no not care whether they are of a political or any other character; they are legislative provisions,—and say that there shall be no money to pay the salaries due to officers of the Government until the three great departments of the Government agree to these changes, you may with equal propriety—and that was what led me to refer to it—put on the scheme of the honorable Senator from Ohio. I said it with no disrespect to that scheme at all. You may put on every other scheme that either House of Congress thinks to be desirable and say nothing shall go forward until our views are met. That is what you have said, and what you have boasted that you would stick to; and, for the purpose of your utter discomfiture hereafter when the final judgment of this people is taken upon it, I hope that you will stick to it. But I hope, nevertheless, discarding the prospect of party advantage and temporary triumph, that Senators and Members of Congress and everybody else will have the wisdom not to stick to it; because I think it to be wrong, and the sooner we have an abandonment of a wrong course, the better it will be for everybody, including those who have been misled into a step of this kind of saying that you will take the Government of this country by the throat, in whatever character the appropriations may rest, and declare it shall not go on until new laws are made, and old ones repealed to suit the particular notions of particular branches of the Government.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. I hope we shall have a vote on this amendment before that is done.

Mr. WHYTE. No; it will take all night.

Mr. BECK. The very moment we take a vote on this amendment the committee will not ask the Senate to go further with the bill today. If we do not dispose of this amendment now we shall have the same wrangle again to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland withdraw his motion?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 28.

Mr. BECK. Now let us have a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MORRILL. I desire that this question shall be decided on its merits and not on any political controversy that has occurred since I offered the amendment; and I therefore call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. FERRY. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1699, after the word "issue," the amendment is to insert "if necessary."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this amendment the Senator from Vermont calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] requested me to say that he had to leave the Senate, and was paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] The Senator from Illinois would vote "nay" if here.

Mr. McDONALD. That is true. I was paired generally with the Senator from Wisconsin, but I was authorized to transfer the pair to another person who might be of opposite opinions to the Senator from Wisconsin and who could not be present. I did not think of that when the question came up, and simply announced my pair. I now vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] has been compelled to leave the Senate Chamber by reason of indisposition.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hoar,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Kernan,	Saunders,
Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Logan,	Whyte,
Bell,	Eaton,	McMillan,	Windom.
Burnside,	Edmunds,	Morrill,
Butler,	Ferry,	Paddock,
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Platt,

NAYS—35.

Bailey,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Thurman,
Beck,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vance,
Booth,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Houston,	Plumb,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Randolph,	Wallace,
Coke,	Jonas,	Ransom,	Williams,
Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,	Withers.
Garland,	Kirkwood,	Teller,

ABSENT—16.

Blaine,	Dawes,	Hill of Georgia,	Lamar,
Bruce,	Grover,	Johnston,	McPherson,
Carpenter,	Hamlin,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Davis of Illinois,	Hampton,	Kellogg,	Sharon.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BECK. Has the amendment I offered been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I beg leave to make a statement.

Mr. BAYARD. I waive the motion for the present.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I came in unexpectedly and cast my vote just now under a misapprehension. I do not know that I can correct it; but

I want to make the statement. I should have voted "yea" on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

THE DIRECT TAX OF 1861.

Mr. GORDON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with any decision of the Treasury Department, with accompanying papers, in relation to the liability of the States for the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia to put the resolution in the customary form, in place of requesting the Secretary to direct him.

Mr. GORDON. I am quite willing to make that modification. Now I ask for the present consideration of the resolution as modified, if there is no objection.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON REMOVAL OF NORTHERN CHEYENNES.

Mr. COKE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, appropriated for the miscellaneous items of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman, all the authorized and necessary expenses of the select Senate committee appointed to examine into the circumstances connected with the removal of the Northern Cheyennes from the Sioux reservation to the Indian Territory, authorized by Senate resolution of February 12, 1879, and continued by Senate resolution of May 13, 1879.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let that be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution was so referred.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ROLLINS, it was Ordered, That J. L. Stevens have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made.

On motion of Mr. TELLER, it was Ordered, That the papers of E. A. Sawyer, now in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BAYARD. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 14, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GEORGE S. FISHER.

Mr. STEPHENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1998) to reimburse George S. Fisher for "waiting instructions" and for "transit to post of duty" to Beirut, Turkey, in 1874, and for losses sustained by the burning of his law library in the consulate building of the United States at Kanagawa, Japan, November 26, 1866; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying memorial, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

KANAWHA RIVER, ETC.

Mr. KENNA. I ask by unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Commerce. It is the same report which I endeavored to make yesterday and to which the gentleman from Illinois objected. That gentleman has intimated to me he has no further desire to object; and if the House will hear the report, which is exceedingly brief, I think there will be no further objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill to amend an "act approved March 4, 1879, making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes," respectfully submit the following report:

The river and harbor act of which this is amendatory made appropriations for the improvement of the Great Kanawha and Kentucky Rivers. At the time said act was passed attention was not called to the fact that specific authority was necessary to authorize the purchase of sites necessary in the prosecution of said improvements. Since the passage of said act a communication from the engineering department calls attention to the necessity for such authority and an act granting it is recommended. Such provision has been made in all cases where the necessity therefor was known at the time of such appropriations. In this case the works will be suspended unless the authority to purchase sites is granted and not only delay in the prosecution of works already undertaken but unnecessary expense and loss to the Government will result. The procurement of sites under the provisions of this bill is to be under the direction of the Secretary of War. The bill makes no additional appropriation of money. In view of the recommendation of the engineers and the immediate importance of such action your committee are unanimous in the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask a question. I see the report states it makes no additional appropriation. Does the original appropriation cover the amount which will be necessary for the purchase of the sites or would it hereafter require an additional appropriation?

Mr. KENNA. It much more than covers it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENNA, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1586, a bill (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1899; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That such parts of the moneys heretofore appropriated by the act of which this is amendatory for the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, in West Virginia, and the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky, as may be necessary in the prosecution of said improvements as undertaken may be expended in the purchase, voluntary or by condemnation, as the case may be, of such sites as are necessary in the prosecution of said improvements: Provided, That such expenditure shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That if the owners of such lands or sites shall refuse to sell the same at reasonable prices, then the prices to be paid shall be determined and the title and jurisdiction procured in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State in which such lands or sites are situated.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman from West Virginia whether the manner of condemnation in the instances cited in this bill is unusual?

Mr. KENNA. It is precisely the same. The language is copied from the last river and harbor bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would like to ask a question. I have heard from a source which is entitled to some respect that there was no necessity originally for this appropriation; that it was not a wise matter in the beginning. Hence, I am very much inclined to vote against this bill, and am a little sorry that I did not enter my objection originally to its consideration.

Mr. KENNA. I am very glad the gentleman did not.

Mr. HAWLEY. But if the gentleman can show me that there is any wisdom or necessity or justice in appropriating this large sum of money for this improvement I will vote for the present measure. I would like to hear something about the original necessity for the appropriation.

Mr. KENNA. If this bill affected in any way the merits of the original undertaking, and if I had the time, it would be a pleasure to me to furnish to the gentleman such information as is at my command in regard to the commerce of one of these streams and the necessity for its improvement; I have no doubt the gentleman from Kentucky would furnish the information as to the other. But I will state that this bill does not in any way affect the merits of the original proposition. The money has been already appropriated; the improvement is now under way; that on the Great Kanawha has been in progress for several years. The only effect of the present bill is to prevent unnecessary delay in the prosecution of the work. So that really this bill does not affect in any way the real merits of the proposition. Hence the gentleman will excuse me from going into the merits of that question, which I would be very glad to do at any time hereafter when that question may really arise. If there be no further inquiry, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered as read a second time. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] demands the previous question on the engrossment and third reading.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. Being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed, there being ayes 85, noes not counted.

Mr. KENNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEASE OF BUILDING FOR WASHINGTON CITY POST-OFFICE.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption a resolution which I am instructed to report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, the right of objection being reserved.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General, the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds, are hereby constituted a commission with authority to lease such building in the city for the purpose of a city post-office as in their judgment the good of the public service may require: Provided, That said lease shall be for a term of not less than three nor exceeding five years, and at an annual rental not to exceed $5,000 per annum.

Mr. REAGAN. That seems to be a simple House resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the House has the power to act on this matter by a simple resolution. It will be again read so that the House may understand it.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. This ought to be a joint resolution. It is a proposition to involve the Government in an expenditure of the public money, and it can only be done by a law.

Mr. COOK. I will change it so as to make it a joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) authorizing a commission to lease a building for city post-office was received and read a first and second time.

The question was on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask my colleague whether there is an absolute necessity at this time for this being done. We have no information on the subject.

Mr. COOK. I will ask the Clerk to read a communication from the Postmaster-General which I send to the desk. The matter was under consideration in the last Congress. It was found that an absolute necessity for this existed, and the committees of both the House and the Senate agreed that this resolution should be reported.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Are we in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. This is not in the morning hour. This joint resolution is before the House by consent.

Mr. WARNER. If I can do so, I object to its further consideration.

Mr. COOK. Unanimous consent was given for the consideration of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1879.

SIR: On the 15th day of January of the present year I had the honor of addressing a communication to you directing the attention of Congress to the following extract from my report to the President for the year ended June 30, 1878:

"I also respectfully urge that some suitable building be provided for the Washington City office.

"It now occupies so large a portion of the departmental building as to leave insufficient room for the clerks of the Department and renders the space available for files and records entirely inadequate. For want of other suitable room many tons of valuable records are now stored in the attic of the building, adding greatly to the danger from fire, in the event of which their destruction would be inevitable."

The Forty-fifth Congress having adjourned without conferring any authority to act in this matter, while the daily increased necessity for such action is being realized by the Department, I desire to again call the attention of Congress to the subject.

The law authorizes the Postmaster-General to lease buildings for post-office purposes in cities where Government buildings have not been erected for that purpose; but in this instance the original design of the Post-Office Department building contemplated the use of a portion of it for the city post-office, and I doubt my authority to move the city office to another place without the sanction of Congress. In addition an act of Congress prohibits officers of the Government from leasing any buildings except where appropriations have first been made for the payment of rent.

It is absolutely necessary, and at this time, that some provision be made for a city post-office; and I respectfully suggest that immediate action be taken to either lease or purchase a suitable property.

Respectfully, &c.,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. SCALES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether this is a report from his committee?

Mr. COOK. It is authorized by the joint committee of the Senate and the House. They met this morning.

Mr. SCALES. And they have acted upon this matter?

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCALES. And this is the result of that action?

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir; they have visited the Post-Office Department, and are satisfied that this measure is necessary.

Mr. SCALES. Is the action of the committee in leasing a building for this purpose to be final?

Mr. COOK. The joint resolution appoints a commission, and the commission is authorized to lease a building for a term of not less than three or exceeding five years.

Mr. SCALES. Will there be a report made to the House before final action?

Mr. COOK. This is a resolution authorizing the commission to lease the building.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask my colleague a further question. Had the committee the question before them whether they would purchase or erect a building, and did they come to any conclusion on that question?

Mr. COOK. There is no bill before this Congress for the purchase or erection of a building. Last year that question was considered for some months. It was found that it would take some years to complete a suitable building. This is a matter of absolute and urgent necessity.

Mr. SCALES. With all deference to the gentleman from Georgia, I think this is a resolution which should go to the Committee of the Whole or to the Committee on Appropriations. We have no time to consider it. It has been sprung suddenly upon us, and the House knows nothing about it.

Mr. COOK. If the gentleman from North Carolina has paid any attention to the proceedings of last Congress in regard to this matter he knows that it was then considered fully. The Postmaster-General believes there is a necessity for this measure, and so do the entire committees, both of the Senate and the House. Both committees visited the post-office and satisfied themselves that this was necessary.

Mr. SCALES. I make the point of order that the joint resolution should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COOK. The point of order is made too late. There was unanimous consent given that the resolution should be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that instead of the word "city" the words "city of Washington" should be inserted.

Mr. COOK. I will make that modification.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia if the premises to be leased are for department business or merely for the Post-Office.

Mr. COOK. The object is simply to lease premises for the city post-office.

Mr. SCALES. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late. It should have been made before the discussion was entered upon.

Mr. COOK. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question, and the gentleman from Illinois gives notice that if the previous question is not seconded he will move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 60, noes 30.

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 63, noes 32.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SCALES, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. COOK.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes—101, noes 23.

So (further count not being insisted on) the main question was ordered.

The question was taken on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time; and there were—ayes 72, noes 22.

Mr. SCALES. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. COOK, and the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SCALES.

Mr. SCALES. I withdraw the point that a quorum has not voted.

So the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to hear the resolution again read.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question being put, there were—ayes 23, noes 110; the affirmative being less than one-fifth of the entire vote.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 25; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not necessary on the question of ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I did not think we could do anything without a quorum.

Mr. STEELE. Was not the point made by the gentleman from North Carolina that a quorum had not voted.

The SPEAKER. That was on the question of the engrossment and third reading. The gentleman from North Carolina made the point that a quorum had not voted and then withdrew it.

The question was taken on the passage of the joint resolution, and there were—ayes 113, noes 28.

Mr. REAGAN. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SCALES, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. COOK.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope gentlemen will give us the yeas and nays so that we may see who it is that wants to vote for this.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 2; no quorum voting.

Mr. COOK. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that he allow a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. COOK. I have no objection to a yea-and-nay vote.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent. The Chair, however, desires to have read, in order to show that his decision was correct as to the yea-and-nay vote, a paragraph from the decisions of Messrs. Winthrop, Orr, and Banks, while they were Speakers.

The Clerk read as follows:

["One-fifth of those present" has always been construed to mean one-fifth of those who vote on the question of ordering the yeas and nays, regardless of the fact as to whether or not a quorum is present.]

It is not in order to repeat a demand for the yeas and nays which has been once refused.—Congressional Globe, 1, 29, page 304; 2, 30, page 623; Journal, 1, 33, page 939.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the yeas and nays can be taken, although they have been refused.

Mr. SCALES. I hope my friend from Georgia will grant us the yeas and nays.

There was no objection, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 80, not voting 68; as follows:

Mr. WAIT. I am paired with Mr. ELLIS, of Louisiana, who is detained from the House by illness.

Mr. CALKINS. I am paired with Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio, on all political questions. I do not regard this as a political question, and therefore I have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. KEIFER, is absent, and paired with Mr. SIMONTON, of Tennessee. If present, Mr. KEIFER would vote "ay."

Mr. TALBOTT. My colleague, Mr. HENRY, of Maryland, is paired with Mr. VAN AERNAM, of New York.

Mr. CABELL. My colleague, Mr. HUNTON, is paired with Mr. HISCOCK, of New York.

Mr. McMILLIN. My colleague, Mr. SIMONTON, is paired with Mr. KEIFER, of Ohio.

Mr. LAPHAM. My colleague, Mr. VAN AERNAM, is paired with Mr. HENRY, of Maryland, and my colleague, Mr. RICHARDSON, is paired with Mr. HULL, of Florida.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. NEWBERRY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That rule 71 be amended by adding thereto the following:

Every bill reported by a committee amending existing law shall contain in the body of the bill, or in a report accompanying the same, a full copy of the section or sections proposed to be amended, with the proposed additions thereto in italics, or words to be stricken out marked with a black line. Every such bill, repealing an act or any part of an act, shall recite in full the section repealed in whole or in part.

TESTIMONY IN CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. DUNN asked and obtained leave to have withdrawn from the files of the House the certificate of Isaac Murphy as governor of Arkansas, dated November 15, 1865, certifying the election of William Byers, of Arkansas, as a Representative in the Thirty-ninth Congress from the first district of the State of Arkansas; and the same was referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER laid before the House testimony and papers received by the Clerk in the following contested-election cases:

Horatio Bisbee, jr., vs. Noble A. Hull, second congressional district of Florida;

Sebastian Duffy vs. Joseph Mason, twenty-fourth congressional district of New York;

John W. Bradley vs. William F. Slemons, second congressional district of Arkansas; and

E. W. M. Mackey vs. M. P. O'Connor, second congressional district of South Carolina.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the papers just laid before the House be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WARNER. More than an hour has been consumed this morning by unanimous consent. I am anxious to get at the silver bill, and therefore I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to move an amendment to the silver bill, so that it may be considered at the proper time.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say something in reference to papers referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to move an amendment to section 3.

Mr. WARNER. Of what bill?

The SPEAKER. Of the silver bill.

Mr. WARNER. I do not know whether that will come up now or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment at this time to the silver bill.

Mr. WARNER. I object.

Mr. CONGER. In regard to the reference to the Committee of Elections of testimony received by the Clerk, I opposed the reference of the certificates of the members from Iowa to the Committee of Elections when that matter was up.

Mr. WARNER. Am I not entitled to the floor?

Mr. CONGER. I objected to referring to the Committee of Elections the certificates of Iowa members when that matter was investigated. I understand (I may be misinformed) that those certificates, notwithstanding the objection made at the time, have been sent to the Committee of Elections and are now being acted upon by that committee.

The SPEAKER. That is not the subject under consideration. There is nothing about the Iowa certificates now before the House.

Mr. CONGER. I merely wanted to bring the matter up now, because if the proposition does involve sending papers to that committee that have been objected to in the House, I desire to reserve all points when the cases come up.

The SPEAKER. That has nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. WARNER. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. ACKLEN. Is it the understanding that the previous question will be called to-day on the silver bill?

Mr. WARNER. It is.

Mr. ACKLEN. At what hour?

Mr. WARNER. I desire to take the floor at three o'clock; I will not call the previous question before three, but will call it as soon as I can get the floor after three o'clock.

The question was taken upon dispensing with the morning hour; and upon a division there were—ayes 111, noes 62; not two-thirds.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will make it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to inquire whether the new rule, which requires a two-thirds vote to dispense with the morning hour, changes the other rule of the House which provides that the first business in order after the reading of the Journal shall be the unfinished business of the previous day?

The SPEAKER. Unfinished business coming over from a preceding day holds, when resumed, the same relation to other business that it did on the previous day. This bill, so far as the Chair is advised, has always been considered after the morning hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is true; but the rule to which I refer has never received a construction from the Chair because the point has not been raised.

The SPEAKER. The question does not arise in connection with this bill. When it does arise the Chair will give his decision upon it. The gentleman will understand that this bill was reported after the morning hour, and has never been considered since except after the morning hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then, as I understand, this bill was made a special order, to be considered after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It came in after the morning hour upon a report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and has been considered ever since after the morning hour, except, as the Chair recollects, in a single instance, when the morning hour was dispensed with by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then this does not affect the question which may come up hereafter as to unfinished business occupying a different position?

The SPEAKER. That point, which may come up hereafter, the Chair does not decide now.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call and let the business of the morning hour go on.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the demand for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The demand for tellers being withdrawn, the motion to dispense with the morning hour is not agreed to.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty minutes after one o'clock; and the House resumes the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and pending when the morning hour expired yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with amendments. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I addressed my remarks mainly to the repeal of section 639 of the Revised Statutes. In the few moments left of my time I shall this morning very briefly call attention to other features of the bill on which I did not then comment.

This bill further provides for a modification of sections 641 and 642 of the Revised Statutes in this respect: it repeals all authority given in these sections for the removal of criminal prosecutions from the State courts. These sections relate to cases arising under the civil-rights bill. That act was passed at a period when the condition of affairs in some of the Southern States with reference to colored citizens was supposed to be different from the state of things now generally conceded to exist there. The dawn of the era of good-will and peace has rendered it unnecessary that this feature, at least, of the civil rights bill should remain in force. I may also mention that some of the best legal minds in this country doubt the constitutionality of that portion of the act authorizing the removal of a cause where a crime or a felony has been committed in violation of the State law. The committee, therefore, has considered it best to modify those sections by striking out criminal prosecutions where they occur; but it has left untouched the right to remove civil suits arising under the civil-rights bill.

The next section that we propose to modify is 643, which confers the right to remove a cause from the State court to a Federal court where revenue or election officers are prosecuted. For similar reasons the committee considered it proper to modify that section by eliminating the provision authorizing the removal of criminal prosecutions from the State courts. I shall not dwell this morning upon the constitutionality of those sections. Other gentlemen of the majority of the committee will, perhaps, fully set forth the reasons for the proposed modification.

The next change made by this bill is in regard to section 644, which authorizes the removal of causes where an officer of the Federal Government is sued. Under the section as it now stands a postmaster or any other officer of the Government is permitted, when sued by an alien, in a State of which he is a non-resident, to remove the case into the Federal court. Under this section a postmaster may remove a suit commenced against him for debt or an action upon a promissory note. The committee believe that civil officers of the Government should not enjoy any rights or privileges superior to those of other citizens similarly situated. Hence we have modified this section so as to confine the right of removal to cases growing out of acts committed under color of his office or in the line of his official duty.

This bill also provides for the repeal of section 647. It relates to controversies between citizens of the same State involving titles to land based upon grants of the State where the suit is pending and of another State. There are very few States in which cases of this kind can arise. In order to carry out the main purposes of the bill, avoid unnecessary removals, and prevent the drainage of the State courts by a flow of cases into the Federal court, we have provided for the repeal of the section, believing that the State courts possess the capacity and integrity to properly adjudicate all that may arise.

Now, Mr. Speaker, only a moment of my time is left, and in that I will say this bill has been thoroughly discussed and considered by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. There is an almost unanimous opinion on the part of that committee that these statutes should be modified. With the exception of a difference of opinion in regard to some of the features of this bill, we come before the House with a united front.

One of these gentlemen, my friend from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] who will soon have the floor, differs with the committee as to the propriety of repealing the authority to remove criminal prosecutions as provided for in sections 641 and 643. He has an amendment which has been offered and printed, and is before the House. My limited time will not enable me to discuss that amendment. I leave its discussion to other gentlemen who will follow me. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. URNER] has objections which go further than those of the gentleman from Indiana. He also has presented an amendment for your consideration. Having occupied so much of your time yesterday, I would not desire if I had the time to trespass further upon the attention of the House. I hope the House will give this bill careful consideration, for the reason that it involves very important questions affecting almost every community in this Union. The object of the bill is to promote the convenience of suitors, to protect the independence of State courts, preserve the constitutional balance of the Federal and State governments, avoid the danger of conflict between the judicial powers, avoid an increase of the burden of Federal taxation, and secure the due administration of justice.

Mr. ORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he will yield for a motion to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, where it ought to go under the rules of the House?

Mr. ORTH. No, sir; and in that connection, before proceeding to the examination of the question now before the House, I think I am justified in saying that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws has beheld with some regret at least the attacks made upon it, not only in reference to this, but other measures reported by that committee. If the Committee on the Judiciary, for instance, were held to the jurisdiction which is conferred upon it by the rules of the House, the amount of business before it and coming from it would be exceedingly limited indeed. The rules of the House limit the jurisdiction of that committee simply to "judicial proceedings" and nothing else. But we have not sought any quarrel with that committee or any other. I take this position: that whenever this House refers any subject to any of its committees it clothes that committee with ample jurisdiction to investigate and report upon it. And it comes with ill grace, I may be permitted to add, from committees which are overburdened probably with business which they have managed in various ways to get into their net to interfere and find fault with the order of this House in any reference it is pleased to make.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether we have done our duty in regard to this bill—I speak both for the majority and minority of the committee—whether we have done our duty as intelligently, as luminously, as ably as some other committees of the House, but to the extent of our humble ability we have endeavored to do the work this House has confided to us, and to that extent have tried to merit the confidence the House has reposed in us.

After these remarks I shall now proceed to the consideration of the bill and amendments before the House. I wish to say to members that the questions involved here are in my judgment as important as any which are likely to occupy the attention of this Congress during the present session, and so far as I am concerned I desire to present my views candidly, dispassionately, and not in any spirit of partisanship.

An important constitutional question is involved, arising under that clause, which gives to Congress the power to assess taxes to carry on the operations of the Government. That clause of the Constitution is familiar to the members of this House, but in order to present this question fairly upon its merits, upon which alone it should be presented, I will call the attention of the House briefly to the two provisions which in my judgment are the foundation-stone upon which this legislation rests and has rested from the earliest judicial history of our Government to this hour.

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes" is the language of section 8, article 1. Following that, in the same section, Congress is clothed with power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," &c. This bill presents three classes of congressional legislation; first, that class arising under what is known as the civil-rights law; second, the revenue laws; and third, the laws relating to the elective franchise.

I propose to confine my remarks entirely to the second branch, relating to the revenue laws, leaving to my colleagues on the minority of the committee the presentation of their views upon the other two branches of this law. The present law upon the statute-book is found in sections 641 and 643 of the Revised Statutes, and provides that in all cases arising under the civil-rights law, the revenue laws, or the elective-franchise law, where a suit or prosecution is pending in a State court, the defendant may have the suit transferred to the Federal court to be tried there. The bill reported from the majority of the committee and advocated by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] proposes to repeal so much of sections 641 and 643 as relates to the transfer of criminal prosecutions, leaving those sections to remain untouched so far as relates to civil causes which may arise under these three branches of congressional law. In my judgment, that change ought not to be made in the law. I regard it as more important that the right to transfer criminal causes should be preserved so far as the great interests of this Government are concerned than that of the mere transfer of cases in which persons are civilly liable, or seek civil redress. And I will give my reason.

I contend that under the clause of the Constitution which I have read the National Government has unlimited powers to pass laws for the collection of taxes; that it has the right to pass laws enforcing that constitutional provision; and having done so it follows as an imperative duty that the General Government must stand by, support, direct, and defend its officers acting under its authority. This is a power belonging to the superior sovereign, the National Government, and this superior sovereign cannot consent to transfer that attribute of sovereignty to an inferior or subordinate sovereign. To do so would place the superior sovereign at the mercy of the subordinate sovereign. To place the protection of the officials of the General Government solely under the supervision and control of State laws and State courts would be crippling, if not entirely destroying, the sovereign power of this nation. And that, Mr. Speaker, no more and no less, is the question that is now submitted to the consideration of this House.

I grant you right here that the law as it now stands in sections 641 and 643 is considered by some of the best lawyers of the land as defective in not furnishing to the Federal courts a proper machinery to carry on the trial and subsequent proceedings after the causes have been removed by transfer as contemplated under those two sections. I probably myself indulge to some extent in the belief of a defective machinery; and hence the members composing the minority of our committee have instructed me to present an amendment to the present law, not to the present bill but to the present law. And that amendment contains this provision which I shall read for the information of the House. After reciting sections 641 and 643 and the classes of cases that can be transferred from the State to the Federal tribunals, the amendment provides:

That in all subsequent proceedings in said prosecution, the said circuit court shall be governed in all respects, so far as applicable, in the trial, judgment, and punishment of the party (if on the trial the party shall be convicted) by the laws of the State where such criminal prosecution shall have been commenced; and in the execution of any judgment rendered by said circuit court in such cause, the United States marshal of the district in which said circuit court is being holden shall, in all respects, be governed by the laws of such State in the same manner as if said judgment had been rendered by the State court from which such criminal prosecution was transferred.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield for a question?

Mr. ORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Indiana to admit that the Federal courts do not now possess the power, for instance, to determine and punish the crime of murder where it is committed in one of the States, and that the object of his amendment is to confer such power upon the Federal judiciary. Do I rightly understand that to be the gentleman's position?

Mr. ORTH. Let the gentleman complete his question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If I am correct I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that his amendment does not go far enough. The doctrine is laid down by Kent in his commentaries, that in order that the Federal courts may exercise jurisdiction over a crime it is necessary that the power should be expressly conferred upon them by act of Congress; that is, the act of Congress shall expressly define the crime which they shall have power to try, and the act of Congress shall expressly declare what the punishment shall be and designate the courts where the crime may be tried. I will read an extract from Kent:

But to exercise criminal jurisdiction in common-law cases was not within their implied powers; and it was necessary for Congress to make the act a crime, to affix a punishment to it, and to declare the court which should have jurisdiction.

Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, in my judgment, does not cover the point which he seeks to make. The amendment simply recites this in general terms:

That in all subsequent proceedings in said prosecution the said circuit court shall be governed in all respects, so far as applicable in the trial, judgment, and punishment of the party, (if on the trial the party shall be convicted,) by the laws of the State where such criminal prosecution shall have been commenced.

Mr. ORTH. I will answer a part of the question of my colleague now. The residue of the question I shall answer in the course of my argument when I come to that branch of it. And in the first place, as to whether I had admitted there was a want of power in the Federal court to go on with a trial without further authorization on the part of Congress, I stated that it was doubted by some of the best legal minds in the country, doubted I recollect in some of the State courts where this matter had been adjudicated, and for the purpose of removing that doubt we have by our proposed amendment provided that the State laws should become a part of the machinery of the Federal courts in the trial of all cases that had been transferred. If we have failed to make ample provision to come within the text of Chancellor Kent I will suggest to my colleague, that while I have the floor he shall prepare an amendment to the bill to obviate the difficulty which he seems to think has been suggested by the Chancellor.

I might say here, Mr. Speaker, that on the other hand it is contended that whenever a transfer of a cause takes place from a State court to a Federal court the laws of the State follow the transfer as a necessary and inseparable incident. Such is the case in regard to the transfer of civil causes; such has been the case under the judiciary act for nearly one hundred years. It has never been questioned that where an act of Congress authorizes the transfer of a civil suit from the State to the Federal courts it carried with it the incidents of the civil law of the State to the Federal court, where it will be carried out in the trial, judgment, and execution, and if that be so, and it has never been questioned, why does not the same rule apply to the transfer of criminal causes?

Mr. BRIGHT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am interested in the gentleman's argument, and I wish to understand if the gentleman is discussing the proposition whether the Federal Government and the State government have concurrent jurisdiction or in case of a conflict of jurisdiction. I understand the propositions to be entirely distinct and the practice of the courts to be distinct. That there may be a practical turn given to the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, I propose to ask him this question: suppose that a revenue officer in the exercise of his duties should commit murder and he should be indicted by a State court and he should insist that his right of trial should be transferred to a Federal court, now is there any law in existence of Federal authority which would give the Federal court jurisdiction to try and punish him for murder?

Mr. ORTH. The gentleman from Tennessee doubtless has in his mind the case of the State of Tennessee against Davis, now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a case where a revenue officer, as he claimed in the discharge of his duties under the revenue laws of the United States, committed a homicide, which the State of Tennessee alleged to be the crime of murder. Davis claimed a transfer to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Tennessee, and upon a difference of opinion between the district and circuit judges of the United States the case has been certified on the very point the gentleman makes, and is now before the Supreme Court of the United States for final adjudication. Now, if the gentleman wants my opinion as to that I will give it to him.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will hear your opinion.

Mr. ORTH. It is not in my judgment a question of concurrent jurisdiction at all. In this controversy one must be sovereign over the other, and hence it cannot be a question of concurrent jurisdiction. If the National Government desires to take the matter into its hands, it is because of the superior jurisdiction belonging exclusively to the General Government under the constitutional provision which I have just read to the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if a murder has been committed in Tennessee the case goes to the Federal courts?

Mr. ORTH. A homicide.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not care in what form the gentleman puts it, but if a crime of that nature has been committed does the gentleman insist that the State is ousted of its criminal jurisdiction?

Mr. ORTH. I do so insist, unquestionably, and the power of the General Government to inquire into the acts of its officers and protect them when they are entitled to protection.

Mr. BRIGHT. You insist that the State is ousted of its jurisdiction. Permit me to ask the gentleman another question. Suppose that in the case given the State does not see proper to prosecute, is there any law in existence that will authorize a prosecution of that case in the Federal court, and is there any law to punish an individual when his case is taken into that court? That is the question which I wish him to answer.

Mr. ORTH. If the gentleman will be patient a little while he will find that I propose to come to the discussion of that very question which he suggests.

Mr. BRIGHT. The gentleman will excuse me. I did not know it lay in his path. The gentleman will see that the proposition I submit is whether there is any authority in the Federal courts in such a case.

Mr. ORTH. Take the case in the gentleman's own State where Davis, in the exercise of his powers, as he claims, under the revenue laws, took the life of a man. I do not know his name nor is it important. He was indicted in the courts of Tennessee, the State of Tennessee bringing her indictment for the alleged crime against Davis in her own courts. He complains to his sovereign, to his superior, to his principal, and says, "While I was in the discharge of my duties I was arrested by the State of Tennessee for having disturbed the peace and dignity of the State;" and then the superior sovereign, the General Government, steps in and says that it will transfer the case from the courts of Tennessee to the courts of the United States for the purpose of inquiring into the alleged crime and having it adjudged in her own courts.

The State of Tennessee has notice of it. It is her suit. The General Government simply provides a different forum in which the State of Tennessee shall prosecute her suit against Davis, who is alleged to be a violator of her laws; and such transfer does not curtail or diminish in any respect the rights of the State of Tennessee in the premises.

The case of Tennessee is transferred from the State to the Federal tribunals; and if the State of Tennessee desires to abandon her prosecution she is the last person to complain. She is then in the attitude of any other suitor who voluntarily abandons his case.

Mr. BRIGHT. That brings the gentleman face to face with the question that I desire him to answer, and that is this: suppose after the transfer of the case to the Federal court, after the Federal court has assumed jurisdiction and has inquired into it, defending its own officer, as the gentleman styles it, that officer is found guilty. Is there any law in existence by which that individual can be executed if he has committed murder?

Mr. ORTH. The gentleman from Tennessee did not hear me when a few minutes ago I stated that it had been the practice of this Government ever since the first judiciary act authorizing the transfer of civil causes from the State to Federal courts, to hold that by that transfer the laws of the State passed from one forum to the other as a necessary and indispensable incident. I stated furthermore that if that be true as to civil causes, there could be no distinction, so far as the inherent right is concerned, of the Federal court being governed by the law of the State, between civil and criminal causes.

But I go further. If there is doubt upon the subject, I then say that this amendment which the minority of the committee propose removes all doubt, and enables the Federal Government, after having once obtained jurisdiction, to retain it for all purposes until complete justice is done between the State and the individual, or between the United States and the individual, or between the United States and the State.

Mr. BRIGHT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a further question?

Mr. ORTH. The gentleman will please be brief, for I have only an hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will be brief. It probably will not be unprofitable, because I understand this is the main point in the controversy. I understand there is a difference between cases in civil practice transferred from the State court to the Federal court and cases in criminal practice so transferred. What I understand from the gentleman's proposition and from his amendment is that informally and by relation the criminal laws of the State are to be adopted in this indirect way. I submit that it cannot be done according to authority.

Mr. ORTH. In further illustration of my position——

Mr. BRIGHT. And I will suggest this difficulty to the gentleman. The criminal laws of the State are subject to its own legislation and liable to be changed at any time. As a matter of course, then, State legislation would change congressional legislation.

Mr. ORTH. I am willing to yield for a question but not for an argument in support of that question.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask pardon of the gentleman. I only desire to call his attention directly to the proposition.

Mr. ORTH. I will thank that gentleman or any other for any proper suggestion in the immediate line of my argument. Sections 641 and 643 of the Revised Statutes provide that when the cause has been transferred it shall thereupon be entered upon the docket of the circuit court and shall proceed as a cause originally commenced in that court. Now, if there be reasonable doubt as to what is now the power and duty of the court, add to that section the amendment suggested by the minority of the committee, and what have you? Complete authority on the part of the Federal court to take jurisdiction and keep it, to try and adjudicate the case, and to enter judgment and issue execution upon it.

But this is not new legislation in this Government. It does not fall within that class of legislation which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] characterized a few weeks ago as legislation which ought to be wiped out because "it was the outgrowth of the hatred engendered by civil strife." What is the origin of this legislation?

The first law passed upon the subject was passed as far back as 1815. I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a portion of that law, premising before doing so that the law was temporary in its duration. It was a war measure, growing out of the war of 1812, and contained a provision that it should cease to exist upon the termination of that war between the United States and Great Britain; but the law itself and the principle enunciated as to the powers of the General Government over these questions go back to 1815. I ask the Clerk to read that portion of section 812 which I have marked.

That if any suit or prosecution be commenced in any State court against any collector, naval officer, surveyor, inspector, or any other officer, civil or military, or any other person aiding or assisting, agreeably to the provisions of this act or under color thereof, for anything done or omitted to be done as an officer of the customs, or for anything done by virtue of this act or under color thereof, and the defendant shall at the time of entering his appearance in such court file a petition for the removal of the cause for trial to the next circuit court of the United States, to be holden in the district where the suit is pending, and offer good and sufficient surety for his entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of said process against him, and also for his appearing at the court and entering special bail in the cause, if special bail was originally required therein, it shall then be the duty of the State court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the cause, and the bail that shall have been originally taken shall be discharged.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will ask my friend what was the date of that act?

Mr. ORTH. Eighteen hundred and fifteen.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Was it not enacted during a period of war?

Mr. ORTH. I have so stated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And when the war was over, was not the act repealed?

Mr. ORTH. The continuance of the act was limited by its last section to the duration of the war.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It was a war measure, then?

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir; it was a war measure, but it was nevertheless an exercise on the part of Congress, on the part of the National Government, of the authority for which I contend in favor of the present law.

I will now refer my colleague on the committee and other gentlemen to another law upon the statute-book which was not a war measure—at least not a "foreign war" measure. I refer to the celebrated "force act" passed during the administration and at the special request of President Jackson. The law of 1833, which I hold in my hand, known as the "force act" of Jackson's administration, is to-day the foundation of the law which is sought to be repealed by this bill. It is an act which has remained upon the statute-book and has been acted upon by the courts of this Government from 1833 down to this hour.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Did not the act of 1866 extend greatly the act of 1833? Is it not now much broader than when it was passed in 1833?

Mr. ORTH. The gentleman will see by a section to which I shall presently refer that there has been very little extension of the act of 1833. Of course as originally passed it applied only to offenses against the revenue laws. The law since has been extended to violations of the civil-rights act and offenses against the exercise of the elective franchise. But, as I stated at the commencement of my remarks, I propose to present simply the revenue phase or aspect of this legislation.

The act of 1833 (Statutes at Large, volume 6, pages 632–3) is entitled "An act to provide for the collection of duties on imports." This law passed the Senate of the United States, if I recollect aright, with but a single dissenting voice; and it passed the House of Representatives by a vote of more than three to one. At that time, as every gentleman will remember, the Senate and the House of Representatives had among their members some of the ablest jurists and statesmen this country has ever produced. This law which those men placed upon the statute-book stands to-day practically unrepealed or changed. I ask the Clerk to read a part of the third section, to which I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MCMILLIN,] my colleague on the committee. He will see that it is almost in hæc verba the law which is now sought to be repealed.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in any case where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in a court of any State, against any officer of the United States or other person, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority, or title set up or claimed by such officer, or other person under any such law of the United States, it shall be lawful for the defendant in such suit or prosecution, at any time before trial, upon a petition to the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which the defendant shall have been served with process, setting forth the nature of said suit or prosecution, and verifying the said petition by affidavit, together with a certificate signed by any attorney or counselor at law of some court of record of the State in which such suit shall have been commenced, or of the United States, setting forth that, as counsel for the petitioner, he has examined the proceedings against him, and has carefully inquired into all the matters set forth in the petition, and that he believes the same to be true; which petition, affidavit, and certificate shall be presented to the said circuit court, if in session, and, if not, to the clerk thereof, at his office and shall be filed in said office, and the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said court, and shall be thereafter proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in that court.

Mr. ORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, the House will observe that this act of 1833 as just read provides for the transfer not only of civil causes but of criminal prosecutions arising under the revenue laws. As I said a few minutes since that law has been acted on continuously ever since its passage; it has received adjudications in the State as well as the Federal courts, district, circuit, and Supreme. In no case during that long period of time from 1833 down to this day has the power of the General Government to pass that law been seriously doubted, much less denied. If, therefore, precedent is worth anything, if any weight is to be attached to the general concurrence of the courts of the land, State and Federal, in their construction of this act and the power of Congress to pass such an act, if any authority is due to the general concurrence of the profession for over a third of a century upon a principle so vital to the existence of the General Government as this, the inquiry naturally arises, is not the question res adjudicata? Is it not settled in favor of the power of the General Government?

I will refer gentlemen who desire to pursue this investigation to the celebrated case of Martin vs. Hunter's Lessees, 1 Wheaton, 335, a case familiar to the profession. This was the case in which it was first held that in "a civil cause possessing a Federal ingredient" (this is the language of Chief-Justice Marshall) there is no doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress to provide for a transfer of this class of cases. For instance, where a State and a citizen of another State are parties, where an alien is a party, where the matter in controversy has reference to some treaty or some patent law of the United States, in any of the innumerable cases possessing a Federal ingredient, the transfer can be made; and it was held by the Supreme Court unanimously, Chief-Justice Marshall delivering the opinion, that there was no doubt as to the validity and constitutionality of the law making that transfer.

Then, again, in the case of Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheaton, 264, the identical question was brought up to the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as criminal prosecutions were concerned.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will my friend from Indiana let me ask a question right there?

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask whether, in the case of Cohens vs. Virginia, this was not the main question involved: it was a question of jurisdiction between the District of Columbia, where the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction, and the State of Virginia; a question of jurisdiction, in other words, between the United States and the State of Virginia? I ask whether that was not the main question passed upon in that case by the Supreme Court, it being one of those questions which is expressly declared by the Constitution as being within its jurisdiction?

Mr. ORTH. That is very true, but it was held by the Supreme Court that the criminal part of the law of 1833 was as transferable as the civil part had been held to be transferable in the case of Hunter vs. Martin. This has been followed up in a recent case likewise originating in the State of Tennessee, reported in 6 Wallace, 252.

I allude to these decisions, Mr. Speaker, because in the examination and decision of this question we want to know, on both sides of the House—indeed, on this question there should be no partisan sides—whether the General Government has the right and the power to follow its officer into any State of this Union and lay on that officer the strong hand of its protecting power. That is the question at issue before us, whether the General Government has the power to enforce the laws which have been made in pursuance of the express grant of the Constitution, or whether the superior sovereign shall exercise its power at the mercy of the inferior sovereign or at the mercy of thirty-eight inferior sovereigns to give their own interpretation of the law, each pointing out its own way in which these officers shall discharge their duty. As a question merely of propriety, would it not be better that the Federal court should announce what is the law on this subject, and let that announcement go forth as the supreme law of the land?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If it interrupts the gentleman I will not ask the question.

Mr. ORTH. No interruption at all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. On that point I wish to ask this question: The only power conferred upon any Federal court by the Constitution is the power conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. ORTH. This is not transferable to the Supreme Court, but to inferior courts in the first place.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The Constitution does not confer any power on the inferior courts. The only clause referring to the jurisdiction of the Federal judiciary is that creating the Supreme Court of the United States. There is another clause which declares that Congress shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, but no jurisdiction is specified in that clause. The question I wish to ask is this: As the Constitution only contemplates litigation as regards citizenship arising between citizens of the different States, I wish to ask the gentleman if a revenue officer, for instance, of Indiana, a citizen of that State, while acting as such revenue officer should step outside of his legitimate duty and commit murder, thus violating the law of the State, being a citizen of the State in violation of whose law he has committed a crime—I ask the gentleman under what provision of the Constitution that case can be removed into the Supreme Court, remembering that Congress does not clothe the officer with power, could not clothe him with power to commit a crime?

Mr. ORTH. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How could such a case be transferred from the State to the Federal court?

Mr. ORTH. That is just the question involved here. The gentleman takes it for granted that where a man is charged with murder he is guilty of murder. When a man is charged with homicide it depends upon the investigation of the question whether that homicide is excusable or not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But suppose on investigation it is found to be murder?

Mr. ORTH. Let me answer this question first. Simply because a man holds an office under the General Government and commits a crime, that does not authorize the transfer of the case. That man's crime must have been committed in the exercise of his official duty, and not otherwise, and it is not transferable unless it appears to a Federal court that the alleged crime was committed in the exercise of his official duty.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. His official duty does not authorize him to commit a crime.

Mr. ORTH. Clearly not. The very object of transferring it to the Federal court to have the trial there by the sovereign whose rights are supposed to be invaded is to ascertain whether what has been done, whether the facts charged against this man, amount to crime or not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Suppose after the case has been transferred on investigation it is found in the Federal court the man was guilty of murder. What then becomes of the case?

Mr. ORTH. Then the Federal court will proceed to find him guilty and hang him.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Under what authority? Under what law?

Mr. ORTH. Under that "incident" which I have endeavored to impress upon the mind of the House all this afternoon, that when a case is transferred the law of the State follows as a necessary incident; if that be not true, then it can be done under the provision we have brought in here as an amendment to existing law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Coming back to the proposition I have already stated, that the Federal judiciary have no power to try a case of murder where the case arises in a State——

Mr. ORTH. But I do not admit that position.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me get through with my question, if you please. Suppose that the case is transferred; suppose after investigation it is ascertained that an officer of the United States Government, a citizen of Indiana, has stepped outside of his duty as an officer of the United States Government and has committed murder. Now, the Constitution having conferred no power on the Federal courts to try a case of murder arising in a State, outside of Government property, fort, &c., Congress has no power to enact a law providing for the trial and punishment of murder in such a case.

Mr. ORTH. I submit that is hardly a question. It is an argument, and is in the line of what I have been discussing for the last half hour. As a matter of course, if the transfer from the State to the Federal court does not carry with it the State laws and Congress has no power to confer upon the Federal courts the provisions of the State laws, then you have a tribunal that is powerless and helpless.

But, Mr. Speaker, right at this point let me refer the gentleman and others who are interested in this discussion to numerous instances where acts of Congress have clothed Federal courts with authority to carry out the laws of the local jurisdiction, the States in which those courts have been held. I refer to sections 721, 722, 788, 858, 914, and 915, where Congress has exercised this power by authorizing the Federal judiciary to apply the law of the State to its trials, its judgments, its executions.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. They all refer to cases where the Constitution has conferred jurisdiction on the Federal judiciary.

Mr. ORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that the Supreme Court in this case of The Mayor, &c., vs. Cooper, from Tennessee, has answered fully the question of the gentleman from Illinois. I ask that the decision of the court be read, both for the purpose of showing the power of the General Government, the undisputed power of the General Government, and as an answer to the question which the gentleman put to me. The Clerk will read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is the right and the duty of the National Government to have its Constitution and laws interpreted and applied by its own judicial tribunals. In cases arising under them, properly brought before it, this court is the final arbiter. The decisions of the courts of the United States within their sphere of action are as conclusive as the laws of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. In pursuance of the Constitution.

The Clerk continued to read as follows:

This is essential to the peace of the nation and to the vigor and efficiency of the Government. A different principle would lead to the most mischievous consequences. The courts of the several States might determine the same questions in different ways. There would be no uniformity of decisions. For every act of an officer, civil or military, of the United States, including alike the highest and lowest, done under their authority, he would be liable to harassing litigations in the State courts. However regular his conduct, neither the Constitution nor laws could avail him if the views of those tribunals and of the juries which sit in them should be adverse. The authority which he had served and obeyed would be impotent to protect him. Such a government would be one of pitiable weakness, and would wholly fail to meet the ends which the framers of the Constitution had in view. They designed to make a government not only independent and self-sustained, but supreme in every function within the scope of its authority. The judgments of this court have uniformly held that it is so.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

During the delivery of Mr. ORTH's remarks,

A message from the Senate was communicated by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1377) to amend section 5440 of the Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 141) for the removal of the political disabilities of John S. Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. McLANE. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to interrupt him a single moment to ask the House to put upon its passage the bill just received from the Senate for the removal of the political disabilities of John S. Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland?

Mr. ORTH. That will do to-morrow. I cannot yield for any such purpose as that.

Mr. ORTH then resumed and continued his remarks.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER.) It has.

Mr. ORTH. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty minutes.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

JOHN S. SAUNDERS.

Mr. McLANE. I hope the gentleman who has charge of the coinage bill will permit me to ask the House to put on its passage a bill which has just come from the Senate.

Mr. WARNER. Only on the condition that it will give rise to no discussion.

Mr. McLANE. If there be any objection I will not press the bill. It is a bill to relieve from political disabilities Colonel Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland, formerly an officer in the Federal service.

Mr. WARNER. Very well.

Mr. McLANE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 141) for the removal of the political disabilities of John S. Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland, be taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, removes from John S. Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland, the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Let the petition be read.

Mr. McLANE. There is a petition which is on file in the Senate, but has failed to come over with the bill. It is in due form of law. I have seen the petition myself.

Mr. CONGER. Does it define the occasion of the disability being imposed?

Mr. McLANE. It states the fact that the disabilities were imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist on the petition being read?

Mr. CONGER. I do not, upon the statement of the gentleman from Maryland.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALKINS. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] who has charge of this bill I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, that it may be printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the third section the following:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion may purchase silver bullion for coinage at its market value, and all gains and profits therefrom shall inure to the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use any surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that the amendment I offer be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out section 3 from the fourth to the fifteenth line, inclusive, and insert:

SEC. 3520. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, without limit, all silver bullion, trade-dollars, and foreign silver coins that may be offered for sale at the market value of silver, and such purchases shall be continued as long as 412½ grains of standard silver can be purchased for one dollar of legal-tender Treasury notes. All such purchases shall be paid for with a new issue of legal-tender Treasury notes. And all holders of any of the silver coins of the United States may present the same in any sum not less than $20 and receive therefor legal-tender Treasury notes at par for the same. That all silver coins of the United States shall be receivable in payment of all Government dues and shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public or private, for any sum whatever. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have the silver bullion, trade-dollars, and foreign silver pieces coined as fast as possible into American silver coins and to apply all silver coins of the United States that may come into the Treasury to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt, before using any of the gold or Treasury notes of the Government, for such purpose.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] if any amendment that may be received is to be voted upon?

Mr. WARNER. The previous question has not been called yet.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that when the previous question is ordered it should be understood that it shall operate upon each section of the bill separately, and that any amendments pending within the parliamentary law shall be acted upon under the previous question, and that each section shall be considered separately.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) That is the agreement under which the House is considering the bill—as in Committee of the Whole. That is its position now, and I understood that to be the wish of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.]

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I desire to offer an amendment which I ask to have read.

Mr. WARNER. I have no objection to having amendments offered to be printed, but I object to consuming time in reading them. I have no objection to their being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PRICE. If we have to vote upon these amendments we must know what they are.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I hope the amendment will be read; it will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Kansas that the amendment can come in only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARNER. The previous question has not been called yet. There are some gentlemen who desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will be received, and considered as pending.

The amendment of Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That there shall be coined at the several mints of the United States silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver, as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the devices and superscriptions provided by said act, which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion, at the market price thereof, sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act, but the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of coin, shall not exceed $10,000,000.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to coin such silver bullion into such dollars as fast as the same can be done with the mintage capacity now existing or that may be hereafter provided, not, however, in any manner to interfere with the employment of such mints for the coinage of gold under existing laws—it being the intent and meaning of this act to employ the mints of the United States to their utmost capacity in the coinage of such silver dollars, subject to the necessary occupation of such mints for gold coinage as now provided for by law: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the payment in silver of certificates of deposit issued under the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 2. When the price of standard silver bullion shall equal the nominal value of the standard silver dollar the owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint to be formed into bars, or into standard dollars without charge therefor for his or her benefit, and the same shall be so formed into such bars or dollars in the order in which it shall be so deposited; but it shall be lawful to refuse at the mint any deposit of bullion of less value than $100 and any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint.

SEC. 3. That any holder of the coin authorized by this act may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums not less than $10, and receive therefor certificates of not less than $10 each corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand; said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued.

SEC. 4. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. LOUNSBERY submitted the following amendment; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Strike out the eighth section of the bill, which, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, is as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 254 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 254. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and gold or silver bullion, with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor, in denominations of not less than $5 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt, which certificates, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited, shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent. beyond the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury; and the certificates for coin and bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for all dues to the United States, including duties on imports, and may be computed as part of the lawful money-reserve of national banks."

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, we are now considering one of the most important questions that will come before this Congress. For myself I am in favor of using silver as well as gold for money. It is doubtless unnecessary to avow myself as being in favor of a double standard. I do not believe that any person or any party can stand or ought to stand upon gold alone. We must use both metals; either one is not sufficient, and I favor the unlimited coinage of each. Many able addresses have been made to this House, and, in fact, made all over the country for these two or three years past upon the use of these metals for money, and they have proven to my mind that it is for the interest of this people to lean upon the double standard. The people of this and most other countries seem to be with great unanimity returning to and holding on to both. I consider the question settled in the United States, and I will not attempt, if I could, to review this particular question upon which I believe the prosperity of this country rests, because the law and the imperial will of the sovereign people have re-enthroned silver to reign jointly with gold.

I take it for granted that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the people of the United States are in favor of silver as well as gold being used as money. They may and do differ about the quantity to be coined, about the weight of the dollar, about the proportion that one metal should bear to the other; but I think that if the people of this country have made up their minds about any one thing it is that silver shall never again be abandoned as money in this country. This is where I stand, and I believe this is where the party to which I belong stands, and where it will stand. I have said that we are considering a very important question, and we have before us a very important bill, and I will state that I expect to vote for the bill now before the House, but I expect that before I do vote for the bill it will be materially and radically amended, and so amended that it will be practically a new bill. And I have prepared and shall offer amendments which, if adopted, will strike out the very extraordinary and ruinous features of the bill. I desire to support any reasonable measure which is necessary to more firmly establish the double standard of gold and silver coin.

While much has been said here upon the question, yet but little has been said about this bill. I believe that, with the exception of the distinguished gentleman who reported the bill to the House, no one has taken up the bill to examine its provisions. If the House will bear with me, I propose humbly to state why I think the bill should not pass as it is, but should be amended and then passed, and I believe that the committee that reports this bill will themselves come to the conclusion that the bill is wrong and ought to be amended in very material particulars, and I have no doubt they have already come to that conclusion.

I do not wish to antagonize this committee, which enjoys my utmost respect, and I desire to act in harmony with the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and what I may say about the bill will of course be understood as being with the utmost respect to the gentleman who reports the bill to the House and to the committee, with whom I hope to act in all useful measures.

Let us look for one moment at the first section of the bill and inquire why we should be called upon now to legislate about matters mentioned in it. The section provides or rather takes up and re-enacts what is now the law in regard to the coinage of gold. I have no time to read the section of the bill, or even read the statute, but any gentleman who does so will find that the bill as reported is almost identical with the statute upon the subject of gold coinage.

Now, sir, why is it that we should stop here when we are considering the most important and vital questions about silver and legislate upon gold? Who has complained of the law regulating gold coinage? It is all right, and needs no re-enacting and no tinkering.

Mr. WARNER. I do not wish to divert the line of the gentleman's argument, but I would ask if that provision of the Revised Statutes is changed in regard to gold alone would not that limit, or whether if that is allowed to remain any other provision would restore silver? I ask if it is not necessary to repeal that provision before silver can be established?

Mr. FORT. No, sir. I think it is not necessary to meddle with gold in this bill, but if the gentleman will excuse me I will promise to try before I get through to answer a part of his question, and a part I will proceed to try to answer now. When interrupted I was about asking who has made any complaint about the law in reference to our gold coinage? and I pause now for an answer. No one. We supposed that the law in reference to gold was already satisfactory. If it be possible (I know it is not) that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] desires to legislate so much that he cannot keep his hands off what is already right——

Mr. WARNER. I simply want to make bimetalism possible, and with that clause of the statute remaining it is impossible.

Mr. FORT. I know that it is not the gentleman's desire. Yet from a casual reading of the bill and a reading of the statute, almost any person would say, "Why, what in the world does the Committee on Coinage desire to legislate about gold coinage for, when it is already satisfactory; this portion of the bill as reported is almost identical with the law as it now is?" It is not, or at least ought not to be, the desire to tinker with the currency. God knows we have had enough of that.

Mr. PRICE. Amen!

Mr. FORT. I sometimes think that if we could only tinker back to where we were when the contraction of the legal-tenders commenced, and having tinkered back to where we were when silver was first demonetized, we should stop and now let well enough alone, we will be doing very well. There seems to be a devouring and maddening fever pervading in some quarters to legislate on the currency and constantly change the standard of value.

My friend says that he desires to legislate about gold because he wants to fix the unit of value. If gentlemen will look at the bill they will find that when the committee come to legislate about silver coinage, in section 2 they declare that the silver dollar shall be a unit of value. Is there any other reason why this first section should be in the bill, except to provide that a gold dollar shall be a unit of value? It is already made a unit of value by the Revised Statutes. I would be glad if the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] or any other member of the committee, would point out to the House why it is that we must legislate upon gold. The gold dollar and the silver dollar are each now units of value.

If my learned friend, who knows more about finance than I do, who has studied it long and well, will only read a few pages further on in the Revised Statutes, to section 3563 I believe it is, he there will see that the statute now defines what a dollar shall be. He will there find that the money of account of the United States shall be expressed in dollars or units. Federal money is one dollar to be counted by multiplying above one and by dividing when below one dollar; the dollar is the unit of value. Any United States dollar is a unit of value.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. FORT. With great pleasure.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will give my reason as one of the committee for voting for that first section. One of the main objects of this bill is to restore the double standard. The law to which the gentleman has referred, and which fixes the gold dollar as the unit of value, was the first step ever taken in this country against the double standard.

Mr. FORT. Oh, yes, the gold dollar was made the unit of value.

Mr. STEPHENS. One moment more. According to the old law the gold dollar was a unit of value. Now the act which it is proposed to repeal by this bill declares that the gold dollar shall be the unit of value. The object of this bill is to restore it back just as the gentleman said, to go back where the tinkering commenced.

Mr. FORT. I have heard the distinguished gentleman with great pleasure. But he will bear in mind that this very section of the Revised Statutes which he proposes to amend, as it is now printed in the statute-book, declares that the gold dollar shall be the unit of value, and we have remonetized silver and provided for silver dollars, and any dollar is a unit under the law as it is.

Mr. WARNER. The unit.

Mr. FORT. The unit or a unit, it makes no difference which, a dollar is a unit of value. But, as I have already said, turn to section 3563 of the Revised Statutes and the gentleman will find that the statute there declares what the unit of value shall be. Now, when the law was passed creating legal-tender notes, was it necessary to say that the one-dollar bill shall be a unit of value? Not at all. I care not whether it is a dollar in gold or a dollar in silver or a dollar in paper, it is the unit of value in this country all the same, and it is not necessary to pass this section in order to establish the unit of value.

I have been drawn on to say much more about this section than I intended to say. I do not know if that makes any great difference whether it is retained in the bill or stricken out; but it has always occurred to me that it is better to let well enough alone. We do not know what knot we may sometimes cut in trying to better something that is already good enough. The man in the grave-yard is made to say on his tombstone: "I was well; I wanted to be better; I took medicine, and here I am." So it may be said sometimes about the currency. When a currency is all right, let it alone. Do not undertake to doctor it, to give it any unnecessary medicine. I am not very particular whether section 1 is stricken out of the bill or not. I think it is entirely unnecessary, and may be mischievous.

The second section of this bill relates to small silver coins; it declares what the coins of the United States shall be. If gentlemen will take the bill and the statutes and compare them with each other, they will find that they are just about the same thing, with the trade-dollar left out.

What is the use of legislating again about subsidiary silver coins when the law is all right as it is? I will apply to this section the same remarks I have applied to the other. If it is unnecessary, the best way in the world to do is to let the matter alone. Who has ever heard any complaint about the law as it now is, relating to any other coin than the standard dollar and the trade-dollar? This section re-enacts the law and drops out the trade-dollar; but why not simply provide that the trade-dollar shall no longer be coined, providing at the same time, as I have already proposed by a bill now under consideration by the committee, that the trade-dollars shall be redeemed with legal-tender silver dollars.

Why is it necessary to re-enact this whole section simply for the purpose of dropping out the trade-dollar? That was the way it happened that the legal-tender dollar lost its place—simply by re-enacting the law, and in doing so dropping out the dollar, an omission which members generally did not discover at the time. Something has been said in this House about that transaction. I presume there were some individuals in the United States who at the time that act was passed were aware of its effect. I do not think my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was aware of the demonetization of the dollar, because as he truly says, I carefully looked up the record, the bill when he introduced it did retain the dollar; and from his remarks as published in the Globe, which I have read, it is evident that he was considering the minor coins, and not the dollar. I suppose it is true that Mr. Potter, then a Representative from New York, did know that silver was being demonetized; it could not have been otherwise from what he then said, which was as follows:

This bill provides for the making of changes in the legal-tender coin of the country, and for substituting as legal-tender coin of only one metal instead of as heretofore of two. I think myself this would be a wise provision, and that legal-tender coins, except subsidiary coin, should be of gold alone; but why should we legislate on this now, when we are not using either of those metals as a circulating medium?

The bill provides also for a change in respect of the weight and value of the silver dollar, which I think is a subject which, when we come to require legislation about it at all, will demand at our hands very serious consideration, and which, as we are not using such coins for circulation now, seems at this time to be an unnecessary subject about which to legislate.—Congressional Globe, volume 102, page 2310.

And judging from his remarks, I suppose that Mr. Hooper, then a Representative from Massachusetts, now deceased, also knew that silver was being demonetized. But the matter passed in general without observation, because a law was re-enacted, leaving out a part that should have been kept in.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some gentleman—I do not know who—stated the other day in debate that the trade-dollar had been fitly called "a trick-dollar." It is the language of a stump-speaker. I only notice it now in order to challenge that assertion.

Mr. WARNER. I made that remark. I took it from the Cincinnati Commercial.

Mr. FORT. It is a fitting remark for some newspaper or some stump-speech. I regret that my distinguished and esteemed friend dignified it by bringing it into this debate. I believe that when the legal-tender dollar was dropped out and the trade-dollar put in, it was the purpose of many gentlemen to put the trade-dollar in the place of the old dollar of 412½ grains. Indeed I do not know that it would have been very wrong if they had made it legal tender and made our old dollar a little heavier; because when we read history we learn that in 1792 Congress provided that the dollar should be equal to the Spanish milled-dollar, then in circulation. It so happened that Congress also provided that the dollar should contain 371¼ grains of pure silver. It is evident that there was a mistake made somewhere. It might have been done by the enrolling clerk. The dollar ought to have been described as containing 377¼ grains of pure silver, and then it would have been of the exact weight of the Spanish milled-dollar then in circulation. Dr. Rittenhouse, who, I believe, was the first Director of the Mint, made the first dollars equal to the Spanish milled-dollars—377¼ grains pure silver; but his immediate successor concluded that he must go by the letter of the law, and accordingly reduced the dollar to 371¼ grains of pure silver.

Thus there was evidently a mistake, which, in my judgment, has cost this people hundreds of thousands of dollars. Our dollar when first coined ought to have been 377¼ grains of pure silver, or almost 420 grains of standard silver. Then it would have become the dollar of account of many other countries and competed with the Spanish dollar. Our dollar was a little too light.

I tell you, my friends, you may talk as much as you please and pass all the laws that you please; sooner or later this country must come into conformity with the other governments of the earth and readjust this question of silver and gold. [Applause.] We cannot control the value of silver bullion in the United States, nor can we control the adjustment of the two metals.

I believe it was our mistake that our dollar was made too light, so that it could not flow in the commercial world alongside of the Spanish milled-dollar. It was the intention of the framers of the act of 1792 to make our dollar conform to the Spanish milled-dollar, but a clerical mistake was made and we have suffered the penalty ever since.

I now come to consider the trade-dollar. I hold that the establishment of the trade-dollar was well intended and a wise measure, and I will show my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] directly where the "trick" comes in. We were purchasing commodities from China and Japan. Our merchants were compelled to purchase Spanish milled-dollars or Mexican dollars to pay for their purchases. They could not send our own dollars, because they were too light. Our mints at that time were idle; our miners were producing silver; it was not used here and must be exported. We were obliged to send to China several millions a year, and in doing so San Francisco merchants and others dealing with China were compelled to purchase Spanish dollars at a premium of 8 per cent. Who paid that premium? The people of the United States who bought the articles imported.

Our bullion had to go abroad as bullion. It could not go as dollars. Our merchants had to pay express charges and commissions in purchasing Spanish milled-dollars with which to pay for their purchases, and it was conceded it would be better for us to put our silver into a proper shape to pass current abroad and be taken by count in the markets of the world. I find in 1872, before silver was demonetized, that the Director of the Mint recommended we should make an ingot weighing 420 grains, so it would be a trifle better than the Spanish milled-dollar, which we could give our merchants in San Francisco at the cost of coinage, which was one cent and a half apiece; and the Director of the Mint made the following recommendation:

It is not proposed to make the new coin or disk a legal tender in payment of debt, but simply a stamped ingot with its weight and fineness indicated. Its manufacture can therefore in nowise give rise to any complication with our monetary system, and neither in theory nor principle differ in any respect from the manufacture of unparted or refined bars now authorized by law, except in being of uniform weight and fineness.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not a political question, although gentlemen on the other side are constantly so intimating and trying to throw some opprobrium on the republican party on account of the "trade-dollar," and in my judgment it was a wise measure on the part of the Government to coin the trade-dollar. There is not the slightest need of our getting into a passion about it, because I tell my friends there are a million of men in the United States peering into this Hall, each one of whom has as much sense as anybody here. [Applause.]

Mr. FRYE. More. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. These people are watching our proceedings. What is the use of our attempting to mislead them by crying "tricks?" We cannot do it. The day for such talk has gone by. You cannot control the crowd now by shouting "tricks" or "bondholder." Sir, as my friend from Ohio very well knows, in more than half of the States of this Union he could not go upon the stump and make a speech without addressing more than one bondholder in any assemblage of people which might be called together.

Mr. WARNER. I make no war upon the bondholder.

Mr. FORT. I do not either; I have no love for them, and I have no hate for them. But to return to the trade-dollar.

Mr. WARNER. I wish the gentleman would show how we got more for our silver.

Mr. FORT. If the gentleman will only let me alone I will try to do so. The Chinese have no mints. Silver bullion was at a discount in China, sometimes 7 per cent. below London, and below New York and San Francisco, so we could not ship silver bullion; if we shipped to China it had to go at a discount below the Spanish dollar. If we sent the Spanish dollar to China it cost us 8 per cent. premium to buy it and only went at par. We made the trade-dollar and put upon it the word "Trade," which ought to have been sufficient to notify the people of the world what it was. When we coined it the United States charged the cost of coinage to the bullion-holder, which was a cent and a half for each piece in San Francisco and a cent and a quarter in Philadelphia, which paid a profit on the work to the Government. And thus the United States was giving employment to its idle mints, and to the poor laboring-men who were in need of employment, and we were also retaining the price of coinage in the United States; just the same thing as when we manufacture rolled iron and steel in the United States instead of shipping pig-iron abroad to have it manufactured there; just the same as we do when we manufacture a barrel of flour in the United States instead of shipping the wheat; in short, it was sending a manufactured article abroad instead of the raw material. And the trade-dollar, thus shaped and manufactured, went abroad worth a hundred cents, when in the bullion it would have had to go at ninety or ninety-two cents only.

Mr. Speaker, I present here two carefully prepared tables, showing how the silver bullion put into trade-dollars is increased in value, showing how many have been coined, and how many exported:

The trade-dollar passed current by count at Hong-Kong, Canton, at Choo Fow, and at all the ports in China and Japan. It became current and soon became more popular even than the Spanish milled dollar. And why? Because it was a finer coin and accurate in weight and fineness.

Mr. WARNER. Did one hundred ounces of silver buy more silk or tea?

Mr. FORT. I will answer the gentleman. One hundred ounces of bullion carried over to China would buy about ninety dollars' worth of silk or tea, while one hundred ounces of silver bullion manufactured by our mints and handy workmen into trade-dollars would buy one hundred dollars' worth of silk or tea, and it was often at a premium; and there is where the gentleman finds the trick he has been unwittingly talking about. Before the trade-dollar was coined merchants had to send their silver bullion to Mexico or to Spain at great expense and sell it for Spanish or Mexican dollars and transport them back to San Francisco at further expense, amounting to 8 per cent. and often more, and then got a rough dollar, often varying several grains in weight.

One hundred ounces of silver bullion carried to the mint in San Francisco would turn out $100, and after paying the Government charges their dollar only cost 98½ on the dollar. We saved the balance; and when our silver bullion went to China it went at par instead of going at 8 per cent. discount.

Mr. WARNER. Any more silver?

Mr. FORT. I do not understand the distinguished gentleman. Any more silver? No; it took less silver to pay for our purchases. I hope my friend will not interrupt me. He knows he had two hours and a half, and he has already consumed a great deal of my short hour. I am willing to answer all his reasonable questions, and would yield to him for any interruption if I could have my time extended.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] must know that the trade-dollar and the Spanish milled-dollar are nearly of the same weight, the trade-dollar being only a trifle heavier.

I will refer him to this table, sir, which he can study at his leisure and be informed. I supposed he had looked up these matters.

COMPARISON OF VALUES.

The Mexican dollar exceeds in value both the Japanese yen and the United States dollar, as will be seen by the following statement:

	Weight.	Fineness.	Pure silver.
	Grains troy.		Grains troy.
Mexican dollar	417½	902⅞	377¼
Japanese yen	416	900	374⅖
American dollar	412½	900	371¼
Proposed new coin	420	900	378

The value of these coins and the proposed commercial dollar may be stated as follows:

United States dollar	$1 00
Japanese yen	1 00.85
Mexican dollar	1 01.61
Proposed new coin	1 01.88

Or, say, about 2.7 mills more valuable than the Mexican dollar.

In the event of the issue of the proposed coin it will be well to give it a title, as for instance, "silver union," differing from the coins representing our subsidiary and dollar of account.

Intrinsic value of Mexican dollar as to gold is as	16.40 to 1
At 8 per cent. premium its market price is as	15.04 to 1
American dollar	15.98 to 1
Fine silver at 1½ per cent. premium, San Francisco market rate	15.79 to 1
In London, fine silver at 60*d.* per (present market rate) standard ounce is.	15.71 to 1
Yen of Japan	16.04 to 1
Proposed silver union	16.28 to 1
Five-franc, by law	15.50 to 1

This table was prepared before the trade-dollars were authorized, and it is here mentioned as a proposed coin of 420 grains troy standard silver. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] when he comes to close this discussion, to tell us why the trade-dollar to-day is ninety-eight cents in San Francisco, as will appear by the table I have read. Why is this? Because the merchant can send it abroad and pay his debts, and he cannot send pure silver for that purpose, nor can he send our legal-tender dollar. That is the reason?

Besides having saved the profit of manufacture to the American people, we have got our silk and tea at 8 per cent. less than it would have cost us without the trade-dollar. The merchant has saved a cent on each dollar. The United States has made a cent and a half for coinage, the miner has got a cent more for his bullion, and the people who wear the silk and drink the tea have saved five cents on every dollar, and better, this money, this wealth has been saved and retained in the United States, instead of going to Mexico or Spain. Now, sir, what about this trick-dollar? Where is the trick? Just putting that magic word "trade" on a piece of silver bullion by our mints it becomes worth ninety-eight cents in the market, and without that magic word it is only worth eighty-five. Let the gentleman show where the trick comes in when he next addresses the House.

Mr. WARNER. Will I answer it now?

Mr. FORT. I would rather the gentleman should do it in his own time. We are the best friends in the world. I am trying, however, to convince him that he ought not to be too extreme and illiberal in his views. But, sir, notwithstanding the trade-dollar was honestly and properly enough provided for and coined, yet it has become a cause of complaint, and gives trouble and dissatisfaction since silver dollars have come into use, so I would stop its coinage and redeem what few may be presented with a legal-tender silver dollar and recoin them. We can afford this, as the Government would lose nothing, but would make something in the transaction.

Now, sir, how about section 3? If you will read section 3 of this bill you will find it is provided that the whole world may come to the United States with their ships laden down with silver bullion, and unload it into the Treasury at par. I do not mean any disrespect to my friend because he knows that I think a great deal of him. But it does seem to me that if he had called upon the directors of the Bank of England, if he had called upon the Rothschilds, if he had called upon August Belmont to draw this third section of the bill they could not have pleased themselves better than he has done it for them.

Now, sir, why is it that we should permit the world to sell their bullion to us at par when it is only worth eighty-three cents in the market? There is no necessity for this. I am in favor of an unlimited coinage, but not free coinage to all the world, as this is; for it is not necessary. The United States is not so pressed for metal that she can afford to give 17 per cent. premium upon all the silver in the world. The great States of California, Colorado, and Nevada can almost supply what we can coin. But I would not put a tariff on silver and keep it out. I am not disposed to keep out foreign silver. But let it come and compete for the silver market in the United States just as we who pay taxes have to compete with other countries in whatever we have to sell.

I find that I am not going to have time to say what I proposed, but I take it that it will be entirely proper to amend that section, and instead of receiving this bullion at par receive it for what it is worth. And I propose this amendment:

The owner of any silver bullion may deposit the same in quantities of twenty ounces and over at any mint at its actual market value in the United States, not exceeding par, which value shall be ascertained by and under regulations to be prescribed by the Director of the Mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. And such owner shall be entitled to receive standard silver dollars in payment therefor; and said bullion shall be coined into standard silver dollars for such purposes.

So that whenever the Rothschilds or their agent, August Belmont, in New York, want to dump their silver into the Mint for the purpose of having it coined into dollars they shall do it at whatever it is worth on that day in the market. Now, that is the free coinage I am in favor of. Certainly it is unlimited coinage. I have not time to treat further upon that section, but I think this amendment addresses itself to my excellent friend from Ohio himself, and he will approve it. Why is he so in love with the bullion-owners? If he is in love, it should be with something better than the bullion-owners. Why should he permit himself to bring in a bill compelling the United States to pay a premium of 17 per cent. on every ounce of silver in the world? If this bill becomes a law one of two things would certainly follow: the bullionists would make over 17 per cent. clear profit as soon as they could unload into the Treasury, or the legal-tender silver dollar would sink to about eighty-three cents on the dollar in a very short time.

There is another reason why we should take the silver only for what it is worth. Sooner or later the other nations of the world will come to the conclusion that the weight of the silver dollar and gold will have to be readjusted, suppose that to be one year hence or two years, more or less, the world will agree upon that—and, by the way, we cannot float long against the commercial currents of the world—we may pass statutes here as much as we please and commerce will pay no more attention to them than the clouds do which float over our heads. We cannot hold silver up to par by law in the United States unless other governments come to the rescue. We all remember that when silver was remonetized in 1878, silver not only did not go up, but it actually went down, and went down faster than it ever had gone down before. We all remember that silver markets paid no sort of attention whatever to our act of remonetization, but fell faster afterward than it fell before. Now, if we do ever have to increase the weight of the dollar, as we may—and I will say I am not at present in favor of that proposition—then to increase the weight of the dollar, for reasons I will soon give, if we shall have coined a hundred millions of 412½-grain dollars and then raise them to 420 or 450 grains, or to any other weight, we will be in honor bound to redeem every one of our light dollars coined of the bullion received under this bill, and which cost us one hundred cents in gold; and then it will be seen we shall have lost by receiving this bullion at more than it is worth. But besides all that, as I have said, it is not necessary to pay any more for it than it is worth in the market. It can be had at its value; it is not worth while to pay more.

There are two or three other sections in this bill which I cannot see it is necessary to pass. The law as it now stands is good enough and ought to stand as it is. Section 5 of the bill relates to small change. If I remember rightly this House has already passed a bill fixing that. And why is it that the gentleman from Ohio will encumber this measure by bringing in the provisions of a bill we have already passed in this House? I cannot see; so section 5 ought to be stricken out.

Section 6 fixes the legal-tender quality of silver. What is the use of that? Sir, the standard silver dollar is now already a legal tender, an unlimited legal tender. The other day I asked my good friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] the question—"whether he did not believe that silver was remonetized?"—and I believe it was the only time I interrupted him, and I beg his pardon for that interruption—and here is what I said and his reply:

Mr. FORT. The gentleman will bear in mind that silver was remonetized two years ago.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, no; silver has not been remonetized, although we do make some money out of silver, and I say that the law which I have been discussing set up a new and different standard—a higher one.

Mr. WARNER. I stand by that still.

Mr. FORT. Is it not remonetized?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir.

Mr. FORT. So the gentleman says, and why? Is it because we have not coined dollars enough to remonetize it? Is it because the coinage of dollars is limited? We thought when we passed the bill of remonetization in 1878 that we had done a good thing. We thought we had remonetized silver. But according to my friend from Ohio, and according to his bill, we did no such thing. He says it was not remonetized.

Mr. WARNER. I adhere to that statement.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman did not tell us why silver is not remonetized, but I suppose he holds it is because there has not been a sufficient quantity of legal-tender silver dollars coined; that it is because the coinage is limited to from two to four millions per month. I suppose he must think it is because we have not opened the gates of the Treasury to the world and given 17 per cent. more for silver than any other nation or people in the wide world pay, as his bill proposes to do.

Now, let us see for a moment what the truth is about this silver question. This is no party question, and gentlemen can be cool. It is true my friend and colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] made some remarks claiming that it was a party question, and republicans were to blame for all that was wrong and entitled to no credit for what was right.

Mr. Speaker, the truth is that silver was demonetized in this country in 1853, and there was not a republican in Congress or in the Cabinet or in any office at that time—not one. Yes, sir, up to that time all our silver coins, large and small, were a full legal tender to an unlimited amount. We had the double standard. It was the Congress of 1853 that first struck down silver in this country.

Mr. SPRINGER. Subsidiary coins only.

Mr. FORT. Ah, the subsidiary coins only, my friend says. Let us see. If my excellent friend will look at history he will find that all small coins were demonetized as to payments above $5, and then they shut down the mints; for thirty-one years not a single silver dollar was coined in this country by the administration then in power, not one dollar; but I do not refer to it in a political sense. You cannot truthfully make the charge upon the republican party, as has been attempted in this debate, that it demonetized silver. The republican party did no such thing. If you will only read the history of the country you will then know that silver was demonetized before there was a republican in the United States. How many silver dollars were coined in the United States from 1792 down to 1860? I will tell the gentleman; just $3,658,670.

The gentleman has had something to say about political parties. In all the years the democratic party controlled this country, although claiming to be a hard-money party, it only coined a little over three millions in dollars and then went out of power; and between 1860 and 1873 there was coined by the republican party $4,387,168, or more in these thirteen years, four of which were in war, than had been coined for the sixty or seventy years before. I am giving facts. And, Mr. Speaker, there has been coined since March 13, 1878, up to May 1, 1879, $31,155,950; and in only a little over one year, under the act of remonetization, we have coined ten times as much as was coined by all the administrations before the republicans came into power. Now the gentleman says that silver has not been remonetized because we have not enough of the standard. If silver was ever monetized and then demonetized, we have certainly remonetized it.

And now, Mr. Speaker, if quantity has anything to do with the matter we certainly have remonetized silver. What does the gentleman say? I tell you silver is remonetized in this country and it will remain monetized. It will be a long day before it is ever stricken down again by any party. And it is too late for the gentleman to claim that silver is not remonetized and that in 1879 he will remonetize silver. Sir, it was done more than a year ago. It was made a full legal tender to any amount. He seems to want to do it over again, and I have no objection to it if he has nothing else to do and wants to be employed. But I will not allow him to say that silver has not been re-enthroned without calling attention to the fact that it has already been done and there is no use of doing it over again. My friend from Colorado, near me here, [Mr. BELFORD,] aptly suggests, "In God's name, how much must we coin in order to remonetize silver?"

Ah! Mr. Speaker, this veil is too thin; we can all see through it. He [Mr. WARNER] will never get credit for remonetizing silver; it was done before he began.

I preferred unlimited coinage when silver was remonetized, but I wanted to do it for the profit of the Government, and not for the profit of the bullion-owners of the world—mainly for the benefit of the Bank of England and the Rothschilds of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, section 3, in my judgment, ought to be stricken out and the amendment I offer adopted.

Sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 are unnecessary and ought to be stricken out the bill.

Section 8, I think, ought to be amended, and if the House will permit me, I will offer an amendment to come up and be voted upon in its regular order, which I will read.

Strike out section 8, and insert the following:

The owner of any silver bullion may deposit the same in quantities of twenty ounces or over, at the Treasury, or at any sub-treasury, at its actual market value in the United States, not above par, which value shall be ascertained as hereinbefore provided. And such owner shall be entitled to receive certificates therefor to the extent of its value in denomination of United States legal-tender notes, which certificates shall never exceed the coin and bullion in the Treasury, and shall be redeemable in standard silver dollars on demand or on call, and shall be receivable at par for duties on imports and all other dues to the United States, and may be computed as part of the lawful money reserve of the national banks, and said bullion shall be coined as required, and paid out as other money of the United States.

Section 8 provides that when the parties do not want to wait, when the Rothschilds come here with a big ship, or August Belmont, the representative of the bullion princes of the world, does not want to wait until his bullion can be coined into dollars may take it to the Treasury, unload it and take certificates at par value. I do not know why my excellent friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] reported the bill in this shape to the House. Is he so much in love with August Belmont that he wants him to make $10,000,000 in ten days, as he can do if he gets this bill passed?

I believe my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. FISHER] is not in favor of that provision, but I suppose he was in the private counsels when it was considered. Can he tell us how this came to be done?

Mr. FISHER. I was outvoted.

Mr. FORT. When August Belmont asks to have his bullion received, and cannot wait to have his dollars coined, he takes out certificates, which are issued at par, and they are worth one hundred cents in gold, although they only cost him eighty-three cents. Now, if you will assure me that this bill will pass in ten days I will show you how to make $10,000,000 in those ten days. This bill provides that this bullion shall be received at par; that the certificates shall be issued at par, and shall be receivable for public dues. They therefore become currency, which will pass from hand to hand and be as good as any dollar. My amendment provides that the bullion shall be deposited only at its market value, and certificates issued thereon at that rate.

There is another reason why I think my amendment ought to prevail. The bill provides that certificates may be issued to the amount of 20 per cent. in excess of all the coin and bullion in the Treasury. My amendment would confine the certificates to the actual amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury. Why does the gentleman wish to inflate August Belmont with 20 per cent. more of certificates than the bullion which he puts in? Under this bill the Treasury can issue certificates to an amount nearly double the market value of the bullion put in. What is the use of that? I would like some one on the committee to explain that. Can my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. FISHER] or my excellent friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] explain this wonderful provision? They say they do not understand it and are opposed to it.

Mr. KELLEY. Will my friend permit me to ask him whether that section is not a re-enactment of the present law?

Mr. FORT. That is the law as to gold only, not as to silver; but I am opposed to re-enacting the present law as to gold, and it ought to be repealed. There is no reason in the world why this Government should now issue certificates of deposit in excess of the amount of bullion and coin on hand.

Mr. WARNER. I will not object to an amendment of that kind. I did not draft that section; it is the law.

Mr. FORT. I am glad the gentleman is now willing to disown his own child. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. That is not my child; it is the law.

Mr. FORT. If it is the law, why did he want to re-enact it, especially if it is wrong? But I wish again to remind my friend that it is not the law now, and I now ask him to turn to any such law; there is none, and I yield to him to read it.

Mr. HASKELL. All the whole coin-certificate business contained in this bill is taken from the statutes.

Mr. FORT. That is as to gold. It is a provision which was passed during the war, when the Government was run for credit and seized hold of everything it could to enable it to obtain means to carry on its operations. If you want to inflate, I am in favor of the honest legal-tender paper dollar. That is good enough.

Mr. CLAFLIN. This bill provides for a certificate for a sum as low as $5. The old law fixes the limit at $10. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] says it is the same as the old law.

Mr. FORT. I would strike it all out; we do not need any of it now. The act remonetizing silver provides for certificates to be issued for silver dollars actually deposited.

I am opposed to section 9 of the bill because it repeals the law remonetizing silver, the act of February, 1878. Does not my friend know that? Of course he knows it. He knew when he brought in this bill that he came in deliberately with a bill to repeal the law passed but little over a year ago to re-enthrone silver as money. This section 9 repeals that law. I say you had better let it stand. I hope it will stand until the end of this Government, as notice to all comers that they had better let the tinkering of the currency alone.

Perhaps some may say that the silver dollar is too light. They do not remedy that difficulty in this bill. Why do they want to repeal the bill remonetizing silver? What is the use of that? Why cannot they let it alone? Can not they keep their hands off? Are they so anxious to legislate about something that they must attack that which is good, which the people of this country are satisfied with? There never was put on the statute-book a law that received more universal approval of the people of the United States than this very law which they propose to repeal before it is two years old, just for the gratification of re-enacting it again. Ah, gentlemen, there is no glory in that. If any, it is very cheap. The people understand this. You cannot make them believe that you remonetized silver.

But is the silver dollar too light? It may be too light. Amendments have been proposed to increase its weight. When the time comes, if ever it does, when the weight ought to be readjusted, I will then be willing to consider it. We have been told all along that we would ruin the credit of this country because we were making a silver dollar too light. What has been the effect? Right in the presence of this statute providing a silver dollar of 412½ grains, and in presence of thirty-one millions of such silver dollars piled up in the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury has been selling our bonds at a rate that no nation on earth ever witnessed before. The financial transactions of this country are a marvel to the world.

I tell you that we have sold our bonds and sold them upon the notice that the buyer may be expected to take silver dollars of 412½ grains for his bond. These bonds are going out to all the people of this country. They are going to the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, by the thousand. It will not be long before the people, yes, the laboring people of the United States, will be the universal and the only bondholders in this country; if our friends will only let the law alone and give them time to catch breath they will take the bonds, and it will not be long before we will not owe a dollar abroad.

It is quite as mischievous to tinker with the dollar and increase its value as it is to reduce its value. I say that silver has not depreciated. I have already said that the day may come when we will have to readjust the relations between gold and silver. But that day has not yet come in my judgment.

As I have already said, our bonds go out and silver is to-day, measured by everything else but gold, worth more than it ever was worth in the world before. The governor and the council of India notified their home government November, 1876, that silver has not depreciated in value there, but that gold had appreciated.

Gold has gone up, but silver as measured by anything but gold has not gone down, but has gone up also. It takes more days' work to-day, it takes more muscle, which is alone the real standard of value, for labor is the standard of value—it takes more labor to-day to buy a silver dollar than it ever did in the world before.

Mr. HAWK. A gold dollar.

Mr. FORT. Yes, it takes more to buy a gold dollar and it takes more to buy a silver dollar—it takes more labor than it formerly did. I tell you that silver has gone up. Gold has gone up more. You can buy more horses, more lands, more houses to-day for $1,000 of silver than ever before for many years.

Why is this? It is not because money is so scarce, is it? Money is scarce, too scarce. It was a mischievous man who first proposed to reduce the volume of our legal-tender currency. It ought to have been allowed to remain at $400,000,000. But our produce is low to-day, and we have stagnation mainly because they have financial reverses in Europe. If we had more money in the United States we would get no more for our products. The price is fixed abroad on what we export, and the price of what is exported rules the balance here.

Before the late war there was in the United States a little over $200,000,000 of paper money and a little over $250,000,000 of coin, making something more than $450,000,000 altogether. Counting all kinds of money, paper, gold, silver, and copper, we never had in this country before the war much over $450,000,000. To-day we have $346,000,000 in greenbacks, good, honest money, every one of them worth a dollar in gold or silver, a currency of which every good citizen is proud. We ought to have $400,000,000 of that currency; it was a great mistake to make any reduction in its amount. We have $324,000,000 of national-bank notes and over $300,000,000 in coin, making nearly $1,000,000,000 of money in this country. Now with this we must soon have prosperity. Let us adhere steadfastly to the double standard, and industry will soon reap a rich harvest of silver and gold.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Speaker, on the 22d of February last I discussed quite fully the present and prospective effect of gold resumption in a speech which included much of what I would deem it appropriate to say upon the bill now under consideration. Being disinclined to plow the same ground again, I shall limit myself to-day to a consideration of the purpose of this bill and some of the chief objections to it.

It proposes to reinstate silver in this country in its old place as the equal of gold as a money metal; to allow it to be coined into dollars free and without limit, as gold is coined; and to authorize the issue of certificates for silver bullion, as we authorize certificates for gold bullion, receivable for all public dues and redeemable in coin.

The first and perhaps the most serious objection is that the Government will no longer make a profit between the present bullion value and the coin value of silver. I understand that an amendment is being considered by the friends of the bill, which will meet the views of some who urge this objection by providing that certificates shall be issued only for the market price of bullion, leaving coinage, however, unlimited and free. I shall be quite satisfied with such an amendment, if it remove objection on the part of those who are otherwise friends of the bill.

THE PREDICTED DELUGE OF SILVER.

The next objection is, that if we have unlimited coinage of silver we shall be overflowed with it from hoards now existing or from the further product of our mines. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] seems especially fearful that we will have an inflation of silver coin and certificates surpassing any wild-cat inflation ever known. I was astonished to hear such direful woes predicted from an excess of metallic money by gentlemen who have been teaching for the last fifteen years that gold and silver were made from the foundation of the world for the money of man; that we can never have too much or too little of it; that if the production should become very large, so much the better, because a full currency promotes business, while intrinsic value gives self-redemption; that if the production be small, that is proof that the honest demand for money is small, and therefore business should check up, and not go on regardless of the divine regulation, or devise wicked expedients to dodge it by a substitute for metallic money.

A part of this theory of the bullionists is undoubtedly correct. There never has been a large increase of metallic money that did not result in enormous advantage to mankind, through the lessening of public burdens and the stimulus of enterprise and industry occasioned by the steady rise of prices incident to such increase. We cannot look back to any epoch of extraordinary prosperity and progress in the history of mankind without finding that it was characterized by an increase of metallic money.

J. R. McCulloch, in an article on the precious metals in the Encyclopedia Britannica, says:

> A fall in the value of the precious metals, caused by the greater facility of their production, or by the discovery of new sources of supply, like a fall of rain after a long course of dry weather, may be prejudicial to certain classes, but is beneficial to an incomparably greater number, including all who are engaged in industrial pursuits, and is, speaking generally, of great public or national advantage.

Ernest Seyd in 1868 said:

> Upon this one point all authorities on the subject are agreed, to wit, that the large increase in the supply of gold has given a universal impetus to trade, commerce, and industry, and to general social development and progress.

I could quote similar expressions from almost every writer, of every school of opinion, on the office and effect of money. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, no man who seeks only to promote the general prosperity and not the interests of a class, whether he be an extreme bullionist or a greenback man, need take alarm lest we should have too abundant a supply of this metallic money which has been the handmaid of progress since the dawn of civilization.

But where are the vast hoards which are to inundate us with silver? I venture to say there is not twenty millions of dollars' worth of silver bullion in the United States to-day, or forty millions' worth in all the world. And among all the coin hoards there is but one on earth from which we could draw any silver for coinage—the hoard of demonetized coin in Germany, which is now so reduced by sales that it is variously estimated at from fifty to eighty millions of dollars—a part of which only she will sell, using the remainder to increase her subsidiary coin.

Now as to the probable increase from future production. The output of silver from all the mines of the world is now but about seventy millions a year, which is far below the annual demand. The United States monetary commission has shown that for twenty-six years past the average exports of silver to Egypt and Asia have been within a small fraction of $40,000,000 a year, exclusive of the exports from California. And for the three years ending with 1878 the Asiatic absorption of silver exceeded sixty-nine millions per annum. The consumption in the arts and in maintaining the supply of subsidiary coin is put by the monetary commission at fifty millions a year. Here are constant and imperative demands, exclusive of the demand for coinage in the United States, which far exceed the world's annual production of silver. The German hoard alone has kept the price for the time being below par with gold; but in spite of demonetization and of the German coin thrown on the market, the purchasing power of silver has steadily risen until it is now fully 30 per cent. greater than it was five years ago.

We have no reason to believe that the production of silver is to be largely increased. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] says that we produced in the United States alone seventy millions last year. He should read up a little before enlightening the benighted West and South on the money question. Our highest production has been less than forty-seven millions in any year, and this year the production not only of the United States but of the world, as estimated by the Director of the Mint, will fall off quite largely from the out-put of last year.

Ah, but, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWMAN,] it is not only a silver inflation, but an unlimited and illimitable paper inflation that we are threatened with under the certificate clause of this bill. The answer to that is that for the convenience of the people who do not want to carry gold, the Treasury has heretofore taken their gold coin or bullion and locked it up and given them for it certificates which are receivable for public dues. The gold is withdrawn when the certificate goes out. So it will be with silver. The certificates will only represent the coin or bullion locked in the Treasury. If this bill should draw to our mints all the surplus coin and bullion of the world the aggregate would probably not exceed one hundred millions, and the annual increase from silver hereafter produced will probably not exceed ten to twenty millions. I fear that those who expect very great relief to the people from a rise of prices resulting from the unlimited coinage of silver and the issue of certificates, will be equally disappointed with the gentleman from Massachusetts who is so distressed with apprehensions of a silver and paper deluge.

PROPOSITION TO INCREASE THE SILVER IN THE DOLLAR.

My friend from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] says he will support this bill if we will adopt his amendment to make the dollar contain 460 grains of standard silver instead of 412½ grains as now. I submit to him and to all other friends of bimetallism that this is not the time to change either of our dollars in order to bring them to equality of bullion value. The depreciation of silver as compared with gold has been the result, to a very large extent, of our own action in first stopping and then restricting its coinage. Restore it to unlimited coinage and it will approach nearer in bullion value to an equality with gold at the old ratio. Then, when we shall have seen the full effect of our act of remonetization, we can determine on the method of bringing our two metallic dollars together. It is best not to build the bridge till we know how wide its span must be.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] denounces our dollar as an underweighted and therefore a false and fraudulent coin. He coolly ignores the whole history of the relative values of silver and gold. Our silver dollar has sixteen times as much pure silver as our gold dollar has of pure gold. That ratio of 16 to 1 is an undervaluation of silver, as is shown by the relative values of the two metals in the markets of Europe for the past three hundred and fifty years. Never since Shakspeare's day, since Elizabeth sat on the throne of England, down till the foolish demonetization by Germany and the fraudulent demonetization by the United States, has one ounce of pure gold been worth sixteen ounces of pure silver in the metal markets of the world. The true point of equilibrium between the two metals is that at which France, the wisest of all nations in the management of her finances, fixed it—15½ to 1. I have here reports of the bullion markets in Europe for two hundred years past, which show that the two metals have oscillated about that ratio—pointing tremblingly to it like the needle to the pole—the divergence at any time being almost imperceptible. Through all the changes in the relative productions of the precious metals the relative values of both have not been disturbed. The world's production of gold jumped from thirty millions in 1846 to one hundred and ninety-three millions in 1853, while the production of silver remained steady at about forty millions; yet during that period the relative values of gold and silver remained steady at the normal ratio of 15½ to 1.

Let us remonetize silver now at the old ratio of 16 to 1. That will go far toward re-establishing equality between the two dollars. Our action is most likely to be followed by the reopening to the coinage of silver of the mints of the Latin union—France, Switzerland, Italy, Belgium, and Greece. In fact, England herself is seriously considering the necessity of opening her mints, which have been closed against silver for over a half century. The immense shrinkage of values and consequent industrial distress which have followed demonetization have so alarmed the governments of Europe that remonetization is now becoming the foremost political question abroad as well as here. If silver shall be restored to its old place among nations as a money metal, there is no probability whatever that a higher ratio than 15½ to 1 will be established or could be maintained.

In this condition of things, what folly it is to stand halting over a proposition to open our mints to our great American product; or to talk about increasing the weight of our silver dollar, which has been the one unchanged standard of value, from the foundation of our Government down to 1873; or to renew conferences with other nations which only last year treated our proposition for remonetization with polite contempt? Let us act for ourselves, and coin our silver product into our own standard dollars, leaving other governments to restore silver when fear of their people shall overcome servility to their money-kings; and if, when the question is settled, we find there is still a difference between our standard dollars let us equalize them by such method as justice and sound policy may dictate.

If we shall hereafter find it necessary to equalize them by changing the amount of metal in either, it will then be a debatable question whether to bring the gold dollar down or put the silver dollar up. In 1792 the ratio was established of 15 to 1. That proved to be an undervaluation of gold, so that our gold coins were at a premium over our silver. Our fathers, in 1834, changed the ratio to 16 to 1, thereby erring as much on the other side. But in making the change they did not increase the metal in the silver dollar, but reduced the gold dollar from 27 to 25.8 grains. This was the right method of equalization. Where dollars are of unequal intrinsic value contracts are, as a rule, discharged in the cheaper coin. The debtor has that option under his contract. The reduction of the higher-priced dollar, therefore, does not wrong the creditor, but the increase of the lower-priced coin does wrong the debtor. I am utterly opposed to the exercise by the Government of its power to change the value of either of its standard dollars, unless it be clearly and imperatively demanded in the interest of the people—for it is a power liable to gross abuse. But if it shall hereafter become necessary to exercise it, I submit that justice to debtors and tax-payers demands that the desired equality shall be attained by reducing the higher-priced coin.

REMONETIZATION AND RESUMPTION.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] and many others who have spoken on the subject, say that by an unlimited coinage of the old dollar we will drive all our gold away, because the cheaper dollar always drives out the dearer one. If that be true, how does it happen that France has $413,000,000 of full legal-tender silver money, according to the estimate of the British silver commission, floating at par with about an equal amount of gold, and at a ratio of 15½ to 1? Why does not her silver drive out her gold? I answer, because it is not true that the cheaper dollar drives out the dearer, if both be equally legal tender—unless there be an excess of currency, or unless an unfavorable balance of trade seizes and carries off part of the circulating medium.

Mr. WILBER. Has not France been compelled to stop coinage?

Mr. EWING. She has stopped additional coinage, but has left her whole $413,000,000 of unlimited legal-tender silver standing wholly untouched—more than half her metallic money.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to ask the gentleman whether France does not pay, to all persons bringing bills against the government, either gold or silver as desired by the holder of the bill, and whether the party he represents proposes to go as far as that in this country?

Mr. EWING. This bill does not touch the question as to what kind of money the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to public creditors. If that question shall arise, I will then be happy to answer the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me another question?

Mr. EWING. I must decline. I want to follow my own line of argument for which the hour allowed me is altogether too short.

Mr. DWIGHT. I suppose the gentleman wants to state facts?

Mr. EWING. I do; and will yield to interruption if I err as to facts; but I do not want to fritter my hour away in mere disputation.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the day will soon come when our balance of merchandise trade will not be enough to cover the very large amount we pay each year to Europe for interest on our public and corporate debts, and for travel, residence abroad, ship money, and insurance. When that day shall come we will have to ship our gold away whether we do or do not now restore silver. The danger of losing our gold is from this annual tribute we pay to Europe and not from an excess of currency through the unlimited coinage of silver. Our per capita circulation is far below that of any of the great nations, and the surplus of silver on hand in the world, and all probable additions to it through future production, cannot possibly give an excess of currency in view of our present small supply and our tremendously rapid growth. Therefore, if our object be to maintain and secure coin resumption, is it not wiser to reinforce our gold supply with an unlimited coinage of silver, so that if the gold be swept off by a change in our balance of trade we will have a large supply of silver dollars to fall back on, instead of the small amount now limited by law, and thus be saved from what the advocates of resumption regard as the greatest of all humiliations and disasters, a collapse of specie payments?

WHY WE COINED SO LITTLE SILVER BEFORE DEMONETIZATION.

I listened with surprise to my friend from Illinois [Mr. FORT] today endeavoring to underrate the effect on our country of the demonetization of silver by talking about our having coined so few of the silver dollars prior to the act of demonetization. He certainly knows the reason. It is that from the establishment of our Government down to 1857, as we did not then produce one dollars' worth of silver in all the United States, we made the coins of other nations a full legal tender here, and thus drew into our circulation the dollars of Spain, Mexico, Bolivia, Peru, Chili—all the great silver-producing countries of the world.

Mr. KELLEY. And the five-franc piece of France, too, was made a legal tender at ninety-three cents.

Mr. EWING. Yes, sir; the countries I have named produced the world's supply of silver, and coined and sent it to us in the form of money fully up to our own standard, and we made it our money by adoption.

Mr. FISHER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there was a number of years wherein we coined the silver dollar, and then for a period of thirty-one years afterward there was not a silver dollar coined by the mints of the United States. They were coined previously to that period.

Mr. EWING. The whole story is just this: from the beginning of our Government to 1834 we undervalued gold as compared with silver, and therefore drew but little foreign gold, and had only a small proportion of gold in our circulation; but we did have a large silver currency, chiefly in foreign coins made legal-tender here. After 1834 we undervalued silver, and that stopped foreign silver coins from coming here, though they were still legal-tender. We thereafter drew from abroad only gold coins and bullion, and had thenceforth chiefly a gold metallic currency. That is the whole of the story.

Mr. DWIGHT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EWING. Yes, sir.

Mr. DWIGHT. How much silver had been coined from 1792 to 1834, and what was the relative value of silver and gold?

Mr. EWING. I have not here the statistics of silver coinage up to 1834.

Mr. DWIGHT. Less than a million and a half.

Mr. EWING. What of that? We produced not a single ounce of silver, and the silver-producing countries sent their coinage to us, which we made legal tender and which thus supplied us with circulation.

Mr. DWIGHT. But there was free coinage. Silver was undervalued; it was worth less than gold. And then in 1834, when the new act was passed, it was worth more. As the gentleman stated, in the first instance the proportion was 15 to 1, and then our silver was worth less than our gold; afterwards it was put at 16 to 1, and then our silver became worth more than gold.

Mr. EWING. And the silver then ceased coming to our country. Before 1834 we had all the silver our commerce could command. We took the coins of the silver-producing countries and by making them legal tender adopted them as our own currency.

Mr. DWIGHT. We had then what the gentleman is contending for now—free coinage.

Mr. EWING. But we had not the bullion.

Mr. DWIGHT. Yes, sir; but——

Mr. EWING. I cannot yield further. I cannot have my time taken up in a mere colloquy.

We are now the great silver-producing country of this earth. We produce five-sevenths of all the silver of the world; and the advocates of this bill are now appealing to the representatives of the American people to let our great American product be money, instead of having it degraded and demonetized. [Applause.]

NO GOOD REASON FOR DEMONETIZATION.

But we are told, Mr. Speaker, that we are taking up here the rubbish of the world, a discarded and rejected money metal, one that we ought not, any more than any other high-toned nation, to make coin of for our people. We are thus in effect called on to accept the fact that silver is demonetized here and in Germany as proof that it ought to have been demonetized. That reasoning is not altogether satisfactory to my mind, though fully as sound as any of the arguments against remonetization. Now, why was silver rejected as a money metal by Germany; why did the United States follow suit; and why has France and the other states of the Latin union stopped its further coinage?

Is it because there was already too much metallic money for the use of the world; or because the production of the precious metals was increasing so rapidly as to threaten it with a future plethora of money? Not at all. The aggregate production of the precious metals was, on the contrary, decreasing. From 1853 to 1873, the year of demonetization, the combined production of the two metals fell off steadily from two hundred and thirty-three millions a year to one hundred and sixty-seven millions. This was not enough, after deducting the amount used in the arts, to supply the annual loss of coins from accident and abrasion. Meantime business was everywhere expanding and the vital energies of the world demanding more money.

Was it because the production of silver was so fluctuating as to make its value too unstable? No, sir. The amount of its production annually is, and has always been, far more regular than that of gold. Gold is the fluctuating money metal. The tables of production of the precious metals for the last fifty-five years show that the production of silver has risen gradually from forty to seventy millions a year, while gold has varied from ten to one hundred and ninety-three millions a year. The reason is plain. It is because gold is produced very largely from placers, where but little capital is required and where the yield is fluctuating and the effort to produce it fitful; while silver is produced everywhere from lasting fissure veins by the expenditure of a large amount of capital in fixed machinery. It is therefore the steadying element of the metallic volume of currency. It is the wheel-horse of the team, while gold is the fractious leader.

Was silver rejected because it had depreciated? No. Our silver dollar at the time it was demonetized was at 3½ per cent. premium over the gold dollar because the ratio of 16 to 1 was an undervaluation of silver. It did not depreciate. And until this raid on silver was accomplished, it stood just where it had stood for two hundred years, at par with gold in the ratio of 15½ to 1.

THE CONSPIRACY FOR DEMONETIZATION.

What, then, was the cause of this war on silver? Why was it that two great representative nations, Germany and the United States, struck down this ancient money metal? The movement was simply the result of a combination of usurers to so contract the currency as to shrink all values and thus double their wealth, and double the burdens of debts and taxes on the shoulders of the struggling masses of mankind. It was a gigantic and monstrous conspiracy of the idle few against the toiling millions. [Great applause.]

The aggregate public debts of all the nations of the earth is about twenty-three billions of dollars. Add to that the debts of political subdivisions and of private corporations, partnerships, and individuals, and the whole aggregate is probably far beyond fifty billions of dollars. A large part of this vast sum of debt is held by a very few men. The Rothschild brothers alone hold three thousand millions of dollars of public securities, and they and their allies conduct the finance legislation of the world. The borrowing nations are their customers, and plead at their counters like troubled farmers at our banks or spendthrifts at the pawnbrokers. They know the debts, revenues, crops, politics, and internal and external trade of every nation, as intimately as a curbstone broker knows the ways and resources of his customers. They dictate or resist all finance legislation which in any way touches their interests. When a nation goes to war its specie is drained off; it is forced to issue irredeemable paper and swell its public and private debts by inflated values; and when the war is over they raise the cry from pulpit, press, and rostrum for specie payments and honest money, and thus pocket two dollars for every one paid out.

In 1859, after gold had been so largely produced in California and Australia that it raised prices in the world generally about 15 per cent., they combined together to demonetize gold—this most worshipful and ever-to-be-revered metal, gold. It was dishonest money then. They made Germany demonetize it, but circumstances did not favor a general raid on gold, and the effort failed of any great result. But, ever watchful for an opportunity to make money scarcer and dearer, and to add to the value of their accumulated bonds, they seized the pliant hour when Germany received its indemnity of a thousand millions of dollars from France, and whispered into the ear of her statesmen that they should take this "best money of the world" as their only money; that they should stand with England aloof from the common herd of nations and take the best money metal, which they falsely claim gave to England her envied supremacy. Germany did it, and inflicted on her people a blow from which they may not for a generation recover. And soon afterward the United States did it—not openly, not with an understanding of what was being done, for it was not till two years after demonetization was accomplished that our people awoke to the fact that the deed was done. Who did it no one knows. You might as well search for the murderer of Nathan as to search for the man or men who did it.

Demonetization was accomplished by two acts of Congress. First the coinage act of 1873, which merely omitted the silver dollar from the coins authorized to be struck. At the session when that act was passed not one word was said by any man on either side as to leaving out the old dollar from the list of coins. It passed the House on the report of a conference committee without ever being read. It passed the Senate without one word of debate by any Senator to show that he knew of the villainy being practiced on the American people.

But when the coinage act of 1873 was passed there were several millions of silver dollars in the banks and in the hands and stockings of the people. They were not demonetized by that act, but remained legal tender. The existence of these old dollars was a cause of uneasiness to the gentlemen who secretly procured the passage of the coinage act. Accordingly the job was completed in 1874 by inserting a clause in the Revised Statutes demonetizing the silver dollars then in existence. The secrecy of this last movement was undisturbed by even a suspicion that it was intended. The codifiers had no right to do anything, and it was not suspected that they would do anything, but to simplify the law as it existed. Their code passed the House without a reading, and passed the Senate, as I have been informed by an eminent Senator, without the bundle even being untied as it lay upon the Vice-President's table—and there was that damnable fraud hid in it. [Applause.]

In 1876, two years after this work of demonetization was completed, Mr. CONKLING rose in his place in the United States Senate and asked his brother Senators whether there was any truth in the ugly rumor then just getting afloat that the dollar of the fathers had been stricken down? Nobody answered but Mr. Sherman——

Mr. DUNNELL. Is it in order for the gentleman to allude to proceedings in the Senate?

Mr. EWING. I am speaking of history—the history of an extinct Congress. Mr. Sherman, the only Senator who answered, merely said that the silver dollar had not in fact been in circulation in the United States since 1853. In 1875, President Grant, in a message approving the resumption law, urged on Congress the necessity of coining largely of the silver dollar as a preparation for resumption—showing that he, who had signed both acts of demonetization, and his Cabinet were unaware of the fact that silver had been demonetized.

Of course, nobody was to blame; of course, nobody intended to do it. It only added about five billions of dollars to the burdens of the American people. It only added about five billions to the wealth of the creditor class. Two and a half times our war debt was thus put on the shoulders of the people. Of course, it was a mistake; but men do not often make as much money as that by a mere inadvertence. [Laughter.] Now, I am quite as much disposed to be charitable in my judgments of men as most people are, but I believe that this was a well-devised, secretly-executed, gigantic fraud on the American people, [applause;] and the profound secrecy with which it was done illustrates anew the saying of Shakspeare that—

"If money go before, all ways do lie open."

EFFECTS OF DEMONETIZATION.

By striking down silver in Germany; by forcing us to resumption in gold alone; by compelling the states of the Latin union to stop the further coinage of silver, there was created an increased, a new, demand for gold to the extent of many hundreds of millions of dollars. Superadded to that, and in part induced by it, was an increased hoarding of gold by the banks of Europe, which the London Economist for December last puts at over $400,000,000. This new demand and hoarding combined withdrew over a thousand millions of gold from its accustomed channels of business; that is, contracted the gold currency of Europe nearly one-third. The result was a fall of gold prices of labor and of all commodities throughout the nations having the gold standard, and a general distress unparalleled in modern times.

The New York Public, one of the most reliable of our statistical journals, and strongly on the side of the money power, in its issue of the 12th of December last, makes this statement:

> We have before us tables covering the prices of over eight hundred articles, over four-fifths in value of all articles entering into commerce or consumption in this country. The shrinkage in the average gold value of commodities (exclusive of all stocks or bonds and of all real estate) from January 1, 1873, to November 1, 1878, appears to have been about 34.1 per cent.

What is true of New York is true of Europe, because this writer speaks of the gold prices of commodities, which are on an average nearly the same in all commercial nations. Assuming that land and labor have fallen in the same proportion, the acts of demonetization have added 52 per cent. to the burden of all the debts and taxes of Germany, England, and America. This increase of debt and tax burdens followed an almost equal increase in the United States resulting from our being forced from the greenback prices of 1867–'68 to the gold and silver prices of 1873. Thus we had "Ossa on Pelion, Pelion on Ossa piled."

In my speech on the 22d of February last I showed that our public debts of all kinds amount to $3,308,000,000, and our railway and canal debts to $2,564,000,000, and our debts of other corporations and of individuals and partnerships, dating back as far as 1873, to about $4,000,000,000—making a grand aggregate of $9,872,000,000 of debts which have been increased over 50 per cent. in effective burden by the shrinkage of gold values caused by silver demonetization. In other words, the acts striking down silver have added about $5,000,000,000 to the burden of public and private debts and an equal sum to the effective wealth of the creditor class. It has added, too, 50 per cent. to the amount of labor and commodities necessary to pay our Federal, State, and local taxes, which were already grievously oppressive to the masses on whom the weight of the burden rests. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that Europe and the United States are shaken with popular commotion; that kings and ministries and parties are alarmed for their safety; and that the remonetization of silver is now the foremost question in the politics of the world? Relief must be given by those who rule, or it will be seized by those who suffer. A restoration of prices to the former bimetallic level; or the scaling of debts, salaries, and taxes to the gold level; or widespread bankruptcy and repudiation, are the only alternatives from which to choose.

But we are told that we must not be the first to remonetize silver, but wait until other nations have acted. That is the cry now of the most considerate of those who a year ago applauded demonetization. They admit the terrible effects of the act, but assure us that, if we will only stand still awhile, the sufferings of the people of England and Germany will force those nations to join us in restoring bimetallism; while if we now restore silver the strain for gold will slacken and the demand for remonetization abroad become less imperative. That suggestion would do very well, Mr. Speaker, if we were not meanwhile suffering intensely ourselves. I have heard of a man who lost all patience one winter night at the whining of his wife's lap-dog. Getting up in his night-shirt, he seized the dog and rushed out of doors, determined to hold it there until it froze to death. [Laughter.] Such is the plan proposed by these gentlemen to us, and we no doubt could freeze out Germany and England if we could stand the freezing ourselves. [Laughter.]

THE HONEST DOLLAR.

I very much wished, if my time had allowed, to have paid some little attention to the cry for "the honest dollar" which my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] raised so lustily. The honest dollar! What is it? It is the dollar of the contract—unchanged in value by the act of the Government. All our newly funded public debt is payable by the terms of the bond in our standard coins as they existed when the refunding act was passed. On the 24th of July, 1876, within a month or two of the time when the secret and fraudulent acts of demonetization came to light, the House of Representatives, by a vote of 119 yeas to 68 nays, declared that the old silver dollar should be restored to unlimited coinage as full legal-tender. The Representatives of the people have repeatedly since proclaimed their purpose to restore it. Every public and private coin debt created since demonetization was made with the certain assurance that it would become payable in the American silver dollar. That dollar is worth to-day in wheat, corn, pork, land, labor, or property of any kind except gold, full 30 per cent. more than before it was demonetized. But that is not enough to satisfy the greed of the money power. It demands all the fruits of its own accomplished rascality. It demands not only the pound of flesh, but every drop of blood that will flow. It will not get it. [Applause.] Nor can my friend from New York impose that view of the ethics of this question on the common-sense people of America. [Renewed applause.]

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Speaker, however men may differ on the question as to who should make the money, how its volume should be regulated and its value kept stable, all men agree that it is indispensable to the prosperity of a growing people that its circulating medium be sufficient and increasing. If it be too little, elastic enterprise finds vent in private credits which rise expanding beyond the money base only to topple over when jarred, and spread distress and ruin on all around. If it be decreasing, values shrink, business becomes unprosperous, capital withdraws its helping hand, stagnation follows, and loss and suffering to all whose fortunes are embarked in industrial enterprise, and especially to that vast number who depend on each month's wages for that month's bread.

All admit, too, that great public debts and taxes are destructive of the prosperity of the masses, consuming the narrow margin between earnings and cost of living, and preventing accumulations, without which the great body of the people cannot rise in intelligence and independence.

All agree, too, that upon the prosperity of the masses depends the success of our republican system of government. [Applause.] Whatever tends to degrade and impoverish them, tends inevitably and swiftly to the establishment of a class-rule, which has always and everywhere cursed humanity. [Applause.]

Here we have a money metal which before Abraham was—before Troy or Tyre or Sidon—and down through all the ages has remained, pre-eminently the money of civilized man. It was the torch of civilization. It lighted Rome to her imperial grandeur; extinguished, it left Europe for a thousand years in night; relighted, it led to the civilization of two continents. We have in our mountain safes a supply of this great instrument of association, this motor of progress, ample for all the wants of our unbounded growth and destiny. Shall we use it? Shall we open our mints to its unlimited coinage? Shall we employ it to rid us of our intolerable bondage of public and private debt; to lighten the load of taxation which now oppresses the energies of the people; and to send through all the arteries of our industrial body the throb of renewed and vigorous life? Honesty, statesmanship, patriotism, all demand that we tear from our statute-books these acts of demonetization which the subtle hand of the money-power inscribed there in the dark; and, in the name of the people, and in the full light of day, reinstate silver where it stood from the foundation of our Government. [Applause and cries of "Good!"]

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. As the previous question has been demanded, I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it will cover the amendments which have been offered and printed, and whether those amendments will be considered as pending?

The SPEAKER. The effect of the demand for the previous question, if sustained, will be to bring the House to a vote on the first section and the two amendments, if there be two, pending thereto. This bill is being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and in submitting the demand for the previous question the Chair will state that it only operates on the first section of the bill and the amendments pending thereto.

Mr. KELLEY. There would be no hour for debate afterward?

The SPEAKER. The seconding of the previous question practically cuts off general debate, and would cut off the five-minute debate on the first section. But when the next section comes up the Chair would consider that until the previous question is called on that the five-minute rule would operate. There must be something upon which the previous question would operate, and this bill being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, in this instance it is upon the first section.

Mr. PRICE. Not upon the whole bill?

The SPEAKER. Not upon the whole bill.

Mr. CLYMER. Would the second section then be open to general debate?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it would only be open to the five-minute debate, for the reason that the House, by having seconded the demand for the previous question, has indicated practically a wish to go from the general debate on the bill to the five-minute debate on the remaining sections of the bill. The Chair thinks this is the common sense and practical construction which should be given to the motion if sustained.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DE LA MATYR] may have an opportunity to speak upon this bill for a short time.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote on the previous question.

Mr. CLAFLIN. It was stated to me by the gentleman who reported the bill that there was no disposition to force the debate to an early conclusion.

Mr. KENNA. And that has not been done.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The gentleman said the debate would run the whole week.

Mr. WARNER. It is about a week since it commenced.

Mr. FORT. I desire now to offer formally my amendment.

The SPEAKER. To what section?

Mr. FORT. To the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 1.
Strike out section 2
Strike out section 3, and insert the following:
The owner of any silver bullion may deposit the same in quantities of twenty ounces and over at any mint at its actual market value in the United States not exceeding par, which value shall be ascertained by and under regulations to be prescribed by the Director of the Mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and such owner shall be entitled to receive standard silver dollars in payment therefor, and said bullion so received shall be coined into standard dollars.
Strike out section 4.
Strike out section 5.
Strike out section 6.
Strike out section 7.
Strike out section 8, and insert the following:
The owner of any silver bullion may deposit the same in quantities of twenty ounces or over at the Treasury or at any sub-treasury at its actual market value in the United States not above par, which value shall be ascertained as hereinbefore provided. And such owner shall be entitled to receive certificates therefor to the extent of its value in denomination of United States legal-tender notes, which certificates shall never exceed the coin and bullion in the Treasury, and shall be redeemable in standard silver dollars on demand or on call, and shall be receivable at par for duties on imports and all other dues to the United States, and may be computed as part of the lawful money reserve of the national banks, and said bullion shall be coined as required and paid out as other money of the United States.
Strike out section 9.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] pending the demand for the previous question, allow this amendment to come in?

Mr. WARNER. I do not.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Ohio——

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot allow debate now while the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. KILLINGER. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. FORT. The Chair I think will allow an understanding to be arrived at.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield for an amendment. The Chair cannot go beyond that.

Mr. CONGER. If the previous question runs upon the first section and a vote is taken upon it, then that section cannot be further amended.

The SPEAKER. This is a proposition to amend several sections; and if it was allowed to come in, the Chair is of opinion that what the gentleman offers could only be inserted after the sections indicated have been struck out.

Mr. CONGER. But after the previous question has operated upon the first section and that section has been adopted then this amendment could not come in.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. At what time would a substitute be in order?

The SPEAKER. At the end of the bill.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, it was well understood by this House——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio does not yield to the gentleman from Illinois for debate.

Mr. FORT. I want to know why my amendment should be ruled out when the gentleman from Ohio has allowed every other amendment to come in?

The SPEAKER. There is now a demand for the previous question and until that is disposed of the Chair cannot admit any further amendment without the consent of the gentleman from Ohio by temporary withdrawal of his demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Would this amendment be in order if the demand for the previous question should be voted down?

The SPEAKER. General debate would then be in order.

Mr. CONGER. Would this amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, when that condition arises, will consider that point.

Mr. FORT. I do not understand why my amendment should be excluded when others have been admitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is simply enforcing the rules of the House.

Mr. FORT. I do not reflect on the Speaker at all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KILLINGER] to lay the bill on the table.

Several members called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on Mr. CONGER'S motion, there were—ayes 90, noes 98.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARNER and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 97.

So the motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1377) to amend section 5440 of the Revised Statutes.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of William Hammant, of Jacksonville, Florida, praying for an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of the mouth of the Saint John's River in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PUBLICATION OF AMERICAN ARCHIVES.

Mr. VOORHEES. Some time ago I introduced a resolution, which was adopted by the Senate, calling on the Librarian of Congress for information connected with the publication of what are known as the American Archives. This morning the Librarian laid before the Committee on the Library his report in response to that resolution, and I am instructed by the Joint Committee on the Library to lay that report before the Senate and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) If there be no objection that order will be made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 602) for the relief of Thomas W. McAffrey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SLATER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 603) to amend section 1846 of the Revised Statutes, concerning Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. FARLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 604) for the relief of John A. Sutter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) providing for a treaty of reciprocity and commerce with the Republic of France; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the conditions of trade and commerce existing between the Republic of France and the United States of America demand the enlightened attention and consideration of both governments; and

Whereas it is the desire and the interest of the people of the United States to maintain the most friendly relations with the people of France and to establish and increase trade and commerce with them upon terms reciprocal and mutually beneficial; and

Whereas a treaty of reciprocity and commerce between the governments of the two republics, upon terms alike honorable and just, will strengthen the friendly ties and will contribute very largely to establishing and increasing the trade and commerce between the two countries and to giving and maintaining stability and security thereto: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c, That the President of the United States of America be, and hereby is, authorized and requested to open correspondence with the government of the Republic of France, with the view and for the purpose of entering into and establishing a treaty of reciprocity and commerce with that government, upon terms and conditions alike honorable and just and reciprocally beneficial; and, if deemed necessary, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners on behalf of the United States to conduct the negotiations preliminary to the making of such treaty, the compensation of said commissioners to be fixed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the joint resolution lie on the table for the present and that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) for the relief of D. C. W. Brink, bearer of dispatches from the United States minister at Mexico in 1869; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

COMMITTEE ON REMOVAL OF NORTHERN CHEYENNES.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yesterday there was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate a resolution offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] to defray the expenses of the committee appointed to investigate the removal of the Northern Cheyennes. I am the only member of the Committee on Contingent Expenses now in the city and, of course, cannot report it favorably, but will report it back in so far as I am concerned with a favorable recommendation; and I ask that the Senate act upon it. I believe the resolution is correct and proper and that it should pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. They will be discharged as a matter of course. I report it back for the action of the Senate, and I ask that the Senate now take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, appropriated for the miscellaneous items of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman, all the authorized and necessary expenses of the select Senate committee appointed to examine into the circumstances connected with the removal of the Northern Cheyennes from the Sioux reservation to the Indian Territory, authorized by Senate resolution of February 12, 1879, and continued by Senate resolution of May 13, 1879.

Mr. COKE. I hope the resolution will be adopted. The appropriation has already been made and this resolution merely provides the means for utilizing it.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 14th instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 565) to authorize the employment of three additional assistants in the Library of Congress.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) authorizing the appointment of a commission to lease a building for a city post-office in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 141) for the removal of the political disabilities of John S. Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 1377) to amend section 5440 of the Revised Statutes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

THE LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. If there is no further morning business, I move to proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAXEY. I believe the Senator from Kentucky announced yesterday that the committee amendments were through with.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir, all the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations have been acted upon.

Mr. MAXEY. In behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads I offer an amendment. After the word "pensions," in line 58, page 3, I move to insert "clerk to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads."

In support of this application, I beg to say that in my judgment (and I think I am sustained in that view by every member of the Post-Office Committee who has served upon it for any length of time) there is not a committee in this body which has harder work to perform than that committee. More nominations go to that committee than to any other; and in addition to that, there is the preparation of the post-route bill, with the amendments to it equal in size to the bill itself. A great many difficult and complicated cases come before that committee requiring investigation in the various branches of the Post-Office Department, and a competent and efficient clerk would be an immense relief to the members of that committee in the discharge of their duties. If the Post-Office Committee had no other business than that to do we could get along; but each member of the committee has his duties on other committees to perform, and an efficient clerk, in my judgment, and I state it on behalf of the members of the committee, is a necessity to the efficient working of that committee which is connected with that Department which is nearer to the people than any other Department of the Government, and whose ramifications extend into every neighborhood throughout the length and breadth of the country.

I would add that the Senate has already acted on the case of the clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I think wisely and correctly, and the same reasons which induced the Senate to make that clerkship a permanent one apply with equal force to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FERRY. I concur most fully with what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The clerk of that committee should have been made permanent at an annual salary before. Perhaps I may have had less concern for my duty, or it may have been a little more modesty than my honorable successor in not pressing the matter; but I am very glad he has taken the responsibility of moving in the Senate this justice to the clerk of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I have long been aware of the necessity for it. The labor of that committee is very large; the duties of the clerk are onerous; he is constantly employed. As contrasted with other committees, I think the labor of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will compare favorably in the light of demanding the services of an annual clerk. Therefore I hope the Senate will concur in the amendment proposed by my friend from Texas.

Mr. BECK. Notice has been given of quite a number of amendments that no doubt will be offered by Senators in their order, some of them perhaps meritorious, others we think of doubtful propriety. I desire the Senator from Texas to understand that I am not going to speak specially as to the amendment he has offered.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer it not on my own behalf, but on behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BECK. I know that it is offered on behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. As I did not care to take the time of the Senate when the bill was first laid before the Senate to make any explanation of it, and as the committee are now through with all their amendments, and as this is the first of the series of amendments that will be offered by others, I desire now, before the Senate acts upon any of the amendments offered by individual Senators or which come from other committees, to state as briefly as I can the action of the Senate Committee on Appropriations and the reasons for that action.

The bill as it came from the House appropriated $18,446,907.81. The bill as amended and recommended by the Senate Committee, and as agreed to up to this time, appropriates $18,541,416.03. The increase made by the Senate committee was $94,509. In a bill of eighteen million and a half dollars, with all the pressure that was brought to bear upon us, we think we have succeeded in keeping the appropriation down as low as we possibly could under all the circumstances. The details are shown by the following table:

Legislative bill.

Object.	Appropriated 1879.	Estimated 1880.	Recommended by House bill.	Recommended by Senate committee.	Increase as reported over 1879.	Reduction as reported from 1879.
Senate	$711,714 30	$744,090 50	$701,383 00	$744,219 00	$32,504 70	.....
Congressional Directory	1,200 00	1,200 00	1,200 00	1,200 00	.....	.....
Capitol police	33,800 00	33,700 00	33,800 00	33,800 00	.....	.....

There were many reasons why we thought it was important not to increase salaries at this time nor to increase the number of officers beyond what had been agreed upon in the last Congress. The state of the Treasury among other things was urged upon us as a reason why this course should be pursued, and the change politically in the majority of this body, without the information that we might otherwise have had after longer experience, may have had something to do with it. The principal items making the $94,000 increase are $43,000 added to the expenses of the Senate more than was recommended by the House, $18,000 added to the service of the Mint, $27,000 in the Interior Department, principally in the offices of Pensions and Patents and the General Land Office, and about $6,000 for the salary of the judge of the district for the remainder of this and for the next fiscal year, that judge having been created by law at the last session of Congress. These items make up substantially the increases which we recommend.

Something was said to the effect, and it has become fashionable to say it, that the Senate is very extravagant in its appropriations, and that this large increase for the Senate expenses is only keeping up the old senatorial extravagance. I do not think that charge can fairly be made against this committee, and I will state my reasons in a moment.

For the current fiscal year the House and the Senate agreed, and the present law contains appropriations amounting to $711,000 for the expenses of the Senate. It contains an appropriation of $1,986,000 for the expenses of the House of Representatives. The estimates for the next fiscal year are for the Senate $744,000 in round numbers, and for the House of Representatives, $2,060,000.

Those increases were necessary because during the next fiscal year we have a long session of Congress, which usually continues seven months, whereas for the current fiscal year, as this extra session was not provided for in present law, the duration of the session of the Senate and House was necessarily limited to three months; all the per diem clerks, all the pages, all the employés of the Senate and House who are paid by the day, must for the next fiscal year be provided for for seven months instead of for three months, as now. Therefore the estimates, as I said, were increased $32,000 for the Senate and, say, $83,000 for the House.

The bill came from the House recommending that there should be appropriated for the Senate $701,000. Observe for the current fiscal year we have $711,000 and the estimates for the next fiscal year are $744,000. The House, having no Committee on Appropriations when the bill was laid before the House, went back to some old bill, to which one I do not know, and cut down the expenses for the Senate not only below the current fiscal year $10,000 but $43,000 below the estimates. The House, as I said, for the current fiscal year has an appropriation of $1,986,000. The estimates for the House for the next fiscal year are $2,060,000. The House in the bill which they sent to us not only did not cut their own expenses down to the current fiscal year, but they appropriated for themselves $2,090,000, coming up to the estimates for themselves and exceeding the estimates by $30,000, while they cut down the Senate $43,000 below the estimates and $10,000 for a seven months' session below what they allowed us for a three months' session.

Some criticism was made in the discussions on the bill about the extravagance of the Senate in restoring salaries to what they are now and in providing for the expenses of the Senate. I did not care to take the time then to state the reason for it, and I now give it, without comment, except to say that we have simply brought the Senate appropriations up to the estimates necessary for the actual expenses for a seven months' session. I believe that the House has not been extravagant in what it has done in regard to its expenditures for the next year, though it has increased the number of its committee clerks from twenty-one to thirty-five, which causes it to exceed the estimates. My information is that they did right, that the clerks are actually needed; as to that I have nothing to say. We are making no complaint as to the fact that the House has increased its own appropriations $103,000 for the next fiscal year over what it is for the current fiscal year, but we do object to having the necessary appropriations for the Senate cut down forty-odd thousand dollars below the estimates and $10,000 for the seven months' session below what was allowed for a three months' session.

Therefore we simply restore the present condition of things. Of course the Senate may add to it. If the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads are allowed a permanent clerk and other committees are allowed permanent clerks, that will be in addition to the amount the committee recommend. We did not go beyond what had been agreed upon in the conference last year upon that subject. So much for that.

Let it be distinctly understood that in what I have said I do not mean to intimate for a moment that the House can get along properly with a dollar less than they have appropriated. We did not see without going into a general revision, which we were not prepared to do, how we could do otherwise than to restore the salaries and expenses of the Senate to the estimate of the Departments which corresponds with existing law, and we thought it best to retain the existing condition of things for the present at least. Really I suppose when the House sent the bill to us they expected that we, knowing more about the appropriations necessary for the Senate than they, would substantially restore it, and I do not think we will have much difficulty in agreeing with them in regard to the Senate expenses when we get together in conference.

Of course the $18,000 for the mint has been explained. It was shown by the Director that it was necessary at New Orleans in order to carry on the operations of that mint. In the Interior Department the labor of the Land Office, the increased duties of the Pension Office and of the Patent Office were represented to us in such a way that we were compelled in justice to the men who were interested to add $27,000; and the law provided for the salary of the judge in this District. These are the principal amendments we have made.

I desire to say as a member of the committee, and I am speaking now only for myself, that perhaps there are very many changes that ought to be made to make the system of appropriations as perfect as it ought to be; the mere cutting down of the salaries of laborers is not, in my judgment, the best mode. I think the cutting off of supernumeraries is a very good way of doing it, but so long as we employ men in the different Departments, and in the Senate and the House they ought to be paid fair wages so that they may comfortably support their families and give proper and satisfactory attention to the duties imposed upon them. I have never been in favor of cutting off $10 here and $20 there from employés and calling it economy, starving good laborers, who are trying to make a comfortable living, but I would strike off all who are not really and necessarily employed and all who can properly be dispensed with and let them seek employment elsewhere; it would in most instances be better for them in the end.

But the great difficulty lies, in my opinion, outside of the mere payment of wages. I hope the two Houses will appoint a committee of some sort, not of investigation, I do not care to have any more investigating committees than we can help, but a committee of examination to look into the great leaks that I think are going on in the management of the finances of the Government. For example, in the internal-revenue department we have dozens, yes, hundreds of men who are called storekeepers and gaugers, who from the month of June until the month of November, generally until December, have nothing to do except to sit about and watch distilled spirits in warehouses and gauge a barrel or two now and then. For example, a man stays for five months at $4 a day to watch little log distillery warehouses when every one of those crops of liquors could be placed in a fire-proof bonded warehouse at some central point in the district convenient to the distiller and the Government, and safe for both, and one storekeeper could watch the whole just as well as twenty or thirty persons at $100 a month do now; and one gauger could do the gauging just as well as the twenty or thirty who are now getting their $5 and $6 a day merely to keep them employed, and pay them for being active political partisans subject to assessments for electioneering purposes.

These are points in the internal revenue, in my judgment, where great saving could be had, if the Commissioner was authorized to do as he now does with the liquor made from the grapes in California, to carry the spirits to warehouses where they would be fire-proof and where the insurance would be less. The Government now gets nothing if the liquor is destroyed by fire or otherwise before the tax is paid; and I believe a change could be made that would result in a saving to the Government of over a hundred thousand dollars annually, and in a saving to the man whose liquor could be more cheaply insured. The great saving, however, would be to the Government itself in the security of securing its tax instead of allowing it to run the risk and cost it is doing now.

So in the custom-houses. We make a permanent appropriation to collect the customs revenue, giving up all the fines and forfeitures and two or three million dollars besides. Congress has no annual control over it. We have four fleets, one known as the revenue marine, with thirty-seven or thirty-nine steamers, coasting all round the country. We have another known as the Life-Saving Service; another known as the Light-House Board; another known as the Coast Survey; and yet the smugglers can steal under the flag of the Coast Survey, they can go on board and dine with the officers, and they will not and cannot be arrested, because they have no authority to arrest them. The Light-House Board has no authority to protect the revenue against smugglers. We did give the Life-Saving Service some authority, and they are doing great good in that service. But why all those four fleets should not be made coast-guards, why each man in the service of the United States sailing along the coast should not aid in the protection of the revenue against smugglers, I have never been able to see. Why four separate little fleets, except to keep up a set of supernumerary officers who call themselves admirals to have independent command, why they should be run independently instead of working together under one head and working in aid of the revenue I have never been able to see. I believe in that regard hundreds of thousands of dollars a year could be saved and the protection of our coast be greatly strengthened.

Another thing. I hold in my hand a list of the custom-houses of the United States, and it will amaze any one who looks at the list to see how extravagant and expensive they are. A permanent appropriation is made out of the annual taxes for their support, and it is expended in ways that Congress knows nothing about. We get accounts of it from time to time in the reports of the Treasury Department that nobody ever reads, and no supervision of the subject is had here. That expenditure ought to be made by annual appropriations, just like every other appropriation. I will take only the first State on the list, and I do not wish to discriminate against or criticise one State more than another, because the whole list is full of absurdities from beginning to end. Here are one hundred and fifteen custom-houses. Maine is the first one. I asked the clerk of the committee to make a note of twelve of the thirteen custom-houses in Maine, which exhibit from $5,000 annually collected for customs down to $6. It appears that the aggregate collections in these twelve custom-houses, all but Portland, is $80,000, and the pay of employés alone is $88,000. That includes nothing of rents or any other expenses. When you add those things, the amount would be double; and so you will find, with the exception of a few custom-houses, the same anomalous condition of things all over the country. At a place where $6 of revenue is collected why should there be a collector, a deputy collector, an appraiser, and all the machinery of a custom-house, aided by the coast-guard, the revenue marine, the life-saving stations, the light-houses, and the coast service. Why would not a single police officer to guard that point be as good a protection against smuggling as all this machinery? Hundreds of thousands are spent, squandered is a better word, in that way. Look, for example, at the custom-house at New Orleans, which collects very little more than the custom-house at Saint Louis. We have all heard that a great many people constantly desire to get employment in the New Orleans custom-house. I know nothing about the details of its operations, but in order to collect the same revenue at New Orleans as at Saint Louis they are spending about four times as much money as they are spending at Saint Louis. They are spending nearly as much at New Orleans as they are spending at Philadelphia where they are collecting four times as much. The same is the case in a great many other places. This list was made up for me by the gentleman in charge of the customs at the last session of Congress; and there is so much in it that the Senate ought to see that, if there is no objection, I will hand it to the Reporter and ask him to put it in the RECORD. I think it is a valuable paper.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us have it all in.

Mr. BECK. I thought Senators would want to see it.

Mr. BECK. I mention these facts for the purpose not of making any party capital out of it. I have no idea of that sort. I believe in the Committee on Appropriations we have never allowed politics to divide us, except when we act upon avowedly political amendments, or to interfere with our business views. I believe that we ought to readjust much of the present management of the internal revenue. I believe the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would be glad to aid us in doing so. I believe that our custom-houses ought to be remodeled; that our little fleets along the coast ought to be consolidated; that all the powers of the Government ought to be brought to bear to stop smuggling; that we ought to make annual appropriations for these purposes and keep them all under the control of Congress; that we ought not to follow in our appropriation bills as we have done heretofore merely the routine of former bills, by saying we gave so much last year and we will give so much the next year, and thus trail on in the old line, as we are only too apt to do. Let us break loose from that mere routine business and look at these great questions intelligently.

I hope we will do it in the future. The members of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have talked it over. We ought to confer with the committees of the House. I merely desire now to call the attention of the Senate to it. I hope that my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] and others, of whom I will not be one, will consider these things carefully, for I do not care about working all summer looking into them, but I trust the chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations of both Houses and intelligent members of the House and Senate, composed of both political parties, will look into all these matters and see if there cannot be substantial improvements made in the collection of the revenues and in diminishing the expenditures of the Government, both in the internal revenue and in the custom service. They may not be able to do it; I think they will. I understand the Secretary of the Treasury is desirous that something should be done, and is, so far as he has power now, seeking to do it; but I suppose he has very little power without the aid of Congress to do very many things that would be very desirable. Perhaps it is a good time now to look into these questions. The democratic party has a majority in both Houses of Congress; the departments are under the control of the other party. It is an ungracious thing sometimes for gentlemen under whom this system has grown up, when mistakes or bad policy of any sort have occurred from time to time, to seek to correct them, but they would be very glad to aid those who are not so immediately responsible in making any corrections of errors that might be found.

Another thing. If we do come into power with the Presidency in our hands, as we hope to do very soon, we would like to have the corrections made beforehand so that we should not be tempted to abuse power ourselves.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that the Coast Survey and the Light-House Board and the general system of revenue marine have prevailed for very many years; they are not a growth of the last few years, but were inherited from very many administrations.

Mr. BECK. The life-saving service is new.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But they have been very largely increased over what they were.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly there has been a large increase, as the country itself has largely increased.

Mr. BECK. I am not complaining of anything from a political stand-point this morning; I am only looking at the matter in a business aspect, to see if we cannot improve it and have a more efficient service at less cost than we are subjected to now. As I am up, let me add something not strictly pertaining to this bill. There are a great many things which astonish me in matters connected with taxation and revenue; among others I refer to a very remarkable statement made by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in the very able speech he made the other day, at which I confess I was somewhat astonished. He proceeded to show that all the money collected by taxes was paid by the twenty-seven adhering States with the exception of about $13,000,000, and that six millions and a half of that came from the tobacco of Virginia, and that the State of New York and other States paid immense sums of money in the taxes imposed by the Government for its support, while the eleven States of the South paid very little, and he intimated that they had therefore but little interest in the taxation of the country. I do not allude to the politics of his speech; but the only thing he said in connection with taxation, which is only too true, was that the democracy had not done as much as they had promised to do in changing existing revenue laws. That I have to admit. They have not done as much as I should like to have seen done in that regard; but the statement of the Senator makes a false impression on the country. I looked at the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the year 1877—I did not happen to have the one for the year just closed—and I find that in internal-revenue matters my State, Kentucky, paid $9,534,424.

Mr. CONKLING. On what?

Mr. BECK. Internal-revenue tax.

Mr. CONKLING. But tax on what?

Mr. BECK. I do not know the detail of it all; principally, I suppose, on whisky and tobacco, for they are the only things that are taxed, except it be beer and stamps.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am glad of an opportunity to propose a question, because I have now a Senator before me who has the courage and the ability, as well as the integrity, to say what he means without disguises. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky, does he think he has made a fair statement in saying that Kentucky pays nine million dollars of internal revenue? Does the Senator feel warranted now in making that statement?

Mr. BECK. Only to this extent: Kentucky did in fact pay into the Treasury, so it is reported, nine million and a half. Much of what she paid tax upon was consumed in other States, and the consumer paid a great deal of it. So far, it did not embarrass the manufacturer, which it did to a great extent because of the enormity of the taxation. It was in fact paid by the consumer, as everything else is. But I was seeking to show the Senator from New York wherein I complained of his statement, that the adhering States had paid so much and the other States so little.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my honorable friend, first of all having indulged me in a question, indulge me in an answer to it? Does he think he has made a fair statement when he says that of internal revenue the State he represents with so much distinction has paid nine million and a fraction?

Mr. BECK. I think I have made it fair, because——

Mr. CONKLING. I agree with the Senator entirely. I think he has too; and I only wanted to know his opinion on this subject in order that I might found an observation or an inquiry.

Mr. BECK. Allow me. I made it fair in this sense: it was paid into the Treasury of the United States by collections made in Kentucky, but (except so far as embarrassment occurs to the manufacturer by reason of his business being embarrassed by the enormous taxation) the consumer of the product ultimately pays, and I was endeavoring to show wherein the statement made by him the other day was not fair and I complained of his seeking to impress upon the country the fact that New York, for example, paid such an enormous amount of revenue simply because it was collected at her port in exchange for products such as the cotton of the South amounting to $190,000,000; and the wheat and provisions of the West, which run up to $190,000,000 more; $100,000,000 from the petroleum and other crude products of the country; and so on. In other words, the $600,000,000 of agricultural products that go abroad pay for supplies in return and bring them in British and other foreign ships that have to land in New York; other people living in other States than New York pay nearly all the duties imposed on these imports. Alabama, South Carolina, Louisiana, each pays according to its population and according to the products they send out. And yet according to the Senator from New York they only paid $13,000,000 when his great State paid such an immense sum. I was seeking to answer him by showing that upon such data my State pays more than double all the New England States pay, if there is anything in his argument or presentation of statistics.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to compliment him on his power of condensed, concentrated answer. I asked him whether he thought he had made a fair statement, and he has traversed continents, vexed seas, visited islands in order to make response, and now whether he means yes or no I cannot tell.

Mr. BECK. Well, would it be fair to answer the Senator's question by asking him another? Does the Senator from New York think that the statement he made in the opening part of his speech the other day was a fair presentation of that question?

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I answer now?

Mr. BECK. Yes, if you please.

Mr. CONKLING. I answer yes—twice over, yes. I think it was fair, first because what I did was to take the finance report, and the report of the Bureau of Customs and read, without note or comment, certain official figures. But I am willing to assume as my own statement what I thus read; and not more true is it that the Senator from Kentucky owns the coat upon his back or the watch in his pocket than it is that the twenty-seven States do pay the revenue which the figures show, and that the other eleven States do pay only the revenue which the figures show. The honorable Senator says, and says truly, Kentucky paid of internal revenue nine million and a half. On what? On whisky mainly.

Mr. BECK. We make one-third of all the tobacco raised in the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Very likely; but we will lay aside tobacco a moment as a matter of convenience to deal with one illustration at a time. Kentucky paid millions as tax on whisky. Was the whisky all drank in the State of Kentucky? We all know it was not; enormous as the democratic majority in that State is, no such consumption of whisky is possible. [Laughter.] The other States help to consume it. The manufacturer of whisky buys his stamps, puts them on the whisky, sends it to market and the consumer pays first the cost of producing the whisky and a profit on that, and second pays this internal-revenue duty, and these two elements of cost and increments of value make the market price of the whisky.

The same thing in substance is true in respect of importations. The merchant in New York imports silk from Lyons. He pays so much to the manufacturer; he pays so much for packing and freight and commissions in buying. He pays so much more in customs duties; and then the Senator from Kentucky, or the British subject in Canada, or the traveler from New Zealand goes into his ware-room to buy that silk; and when the importer sells he sells for a sum which will reimburse all the cost and pay a profit beside.

Just like the whisky producer in Kentucky the importer is the man who primarily pays the tax. He is the tax-dealer with the Treasury. He is the only man the Treasury knows in the transaction. He is the man who appears and truly appears in a statement of the rendition of the tax. To say, because Kentucky does not swallow all the high wines she produces, or because Manhattan Island does not wear all the silks she imports, that the Commissioner of Customs is false and the Commissioner of Revenue is false when they attribute to every State the tax there gathered, is in my humble opinion a lame and far-fetched evasion of an inconvenient fact. Were I not speaking during the time of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, I would make the truth much more clear for other reasons than this brief statement makes it; if he will forgive me for yet one other moment, I will add a single observation.

For some reason these tax figures have much disgruntled the democracy. The changes have been rung on the only answer we have heard. It is said that certain States and no others have entrepôts, ports of entry, to which lines of steamships ply, that thus the geography of the country and the courses of ocean transit determine the ports and the States in which custom duties are paid.

Even this is not true.

Were the Revised Statutes at hand I would read the refutation of all this. Had such a theory been advanced two decades ago, there would have been force in it; but more than ten years ago the representatives of the West, of the Northwest, of the Southwest, of the mid-continental States combined with much unanimity and secured the passage of a statute under which every city named, not only seaboard cities but interior cities, Cincinnati, Toledo, Cleveland, Evansville, Savannah, Mobile, Memphis, Milwaukee, Saint Louis, Chicago, Detroit, New Orleans, and others may import directly.

Thus Louisville, Kentucky, may import just as freely as the city of New York. Why? Because the provision is that a man in Louisville wishing to import anything by a line of steamships coming to New Orleans, to Baltimore, to Charleston, to Philadelphia, to New York, to Boston, where he will, may do so, and in place of duties being paid at the port of arrival and so appearing in the public ledgers no entry whatever appears, but the goods go on in bond to Louisville, and there the duties are paid and there the return of the revenue appears. So that under the present laws, laws which have existed for some years, even this criticism has no foundation.

For these reasons, and others with which I will not encroach upon my honorable friend at this moment, I answer his question yes. I believe he stated fairly when he said Kentucky paid nine and a half million dollars of internal revenue, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Commissioner of Customs and the Secretary of the Treasury stated fairly when they said as I read that in this great partnership of ours certain members of the firm pay two hundred and twenty-four millions annually of revenue, and other members contribute one-twentieth part of the capital: whether the influence, the rights, and the precedence accorded now to these contributors respectively, is in the same ratio, I leave to the arithmetic of the honorable Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I said I was trying to avoid politics in the management of this bill, and I am determined to continue to do it. But the Senator from New York has answered his own argument made the other day to my satisfaction when he has said that the consumers paid the tax, and that although goods were landed in New York and paid duties there, either by the importer himself or by importers living in other parts of the country, when they were scattered over the country that tax was added to the price and was paid by the men who ultimately consume them just as the tax on the whisky and tobacco of Kentucky is paid in great part by the men who consume them. Those taxes are taxes on consumption except where they embarrass business, and the first statement made by him that the twenty-seven adhering States contributed it all and paid it all is only true in the sense that the collection primarily is at a particular given point; but the impression he sought to make in the speech he made the other day has been answered by himself to-day, showing that the tax is not paid by the men who primarily hand it over to the Government, but it is paid by the consumers, no matter where they live.

I was showing that, according to the Senator's argument, when I was interrupted, Kentucky paid $9,534,000 of internal revenue in 1877. The State of Massachusetts paid $2,668.76; Connecticut, $661,420.26; Maine, $79,620.89; New Hampshire, $234,998.99; Rhode Island, $233,164.87; Vermont, $50,093.11. Total of the New England States, $2,928,024.68. Kentucky paid $5,600,000 more than all the six New England States. The State of Virginia, one of the eleven seceded States that the Senator said paid so little, paid alone $7,932,220.78 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, while all the States of New England paid only $3,928,024.68. Old Virginia, dismembered as she was by taking West Virginia from her, was paying $4,000,000 more than all the six States of New England combined, and she was one of the eleven that the Senator from New York was complaining had contributed nothing toward the partnership taxes. He has made further statement or illustration unnecessary.

Why, sir, I might show that every advantage has been given to the States lying in that corner of the Union, and it has all been taken from the great agricultural producing regions of the South and West. The very customs that come in from the port of New York are what constitute our balance of trade or our return for the productions sent abroad. Who sends them? One hundred and ninety million dollars is the product of the cotton crop of the South alone; that goes abroad and furnishes cotton and exchanges to all the nations of continental Europe, principally, it is true, to Liverpool. The only balance of trade we have is by reason of the crude products of the West and South six hundred odd million of the seven hundred million, speaking in round numbers, that were sent abroad of purely agricultural products that go from west of the Alleghanies and south of Pennsylvania in great part. And yet we are told that these people who wear the articles imported, who consume them—and they help to consume our tobacco and whisky as well—pay nothing. Do they not wear the cloth and other things that are imported, as well as the men of New York? These eleven million people South furnish nearly one-half of all our exports, the money received for which brings back the articles that pay the customs duties, and those people consume in proportion to their population and ability just as much as the Senator from New York or any gentleman on this floor. Although the bulk of the customs duties is paid in New York the payment is really made by the consumer, whether he lives North, South, East, or West, and is a tax upon him. Our system of finance is so arranged that the coachman of Mr. Vanderbilt or Mr. Stewart pays as much as either Mr. Vanderbilt or Mr. Stewart to the revenues of this Government; the $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 they own contributes nothing. The bondholder can ride over roads that his coachman has to work to keep up for him, and send his children to a school he does not pay a dollar to maintain; he avoids taxation in every shape and form. The blanket that the poorest negro in the South wears pays double what the finest blanket Mr. Vanderbilt sleeps under pays. The whisky of the coachman pays 400 per cent., while the sherry and Madeira that the distinguished gentlemen on the other side drink pays only 10 per cent. Everything is so arranged as to tax poverty and labor; everything is done to exempt wealth; and for gentlemen to rise here and claim that they are paying all the taxes is ridiculous. There is not a negro in the South, I repeat, that has a family of five children who does not pay more to support this Government than Mr. Stewart did the day he died, as he had only himself and his wife to provide for, and all the taxes that any man pays come from what he eats and wears and drinks or uses; the poorest man pays as much as the richest. Yes, sir, 50 per cent. of what he earns is taken from the laborer in one form or another, while less than ½ of 1 per cent. of what many of the rich men of New York make is taken from them in the form of taxation. The Army and the Navy of the United States and all the police of the United States are kept up and maintained to protect and preserve their untaxed property; and yet they are complaining that the people living in the South and living in the agricultural regions are not contributing as much as they are to the support of the Government.

I did not desire to go into that subject at length; but there are numerous inequalities in other regards. We were told by the Senator from New York, too, that Congress had taken off ten or fifteen millions of revenue in order to give relief to the people who were raising tobacco in the South, and that was made a matter of complaint; the Treasury officials also sought to make us believe that that was true. Sir, I have the report of the revenue collected for the nine months ending the 30th of April, 1878, and the revenue collected for the nine months ending the 30th of April, 1879, and the record shows that so far from there being a falling off of eleven or twelve millions of revenue in the last nine months we collected $223,000,000, and in the nine months preceding $218,000,000, an increase of $5,000,000, and the internal revenue of the last nine months was $88,400,000, while for the nine months preceding that it was $88,700,000—less than $300,000 difference. I wrote on the 6th day of this month to the Commissioner and I learned from him that the amount collected from internal revenue from the 1st to the 6th of May, inclusive, was about four and a half millions, while for the nine months before it was less than three millions, or an increase of internal revenue of $1,323,788.28 in the first six days of this month over what it was for the corresponding days of the same months last year. And this being the 15th of May I will venture to assert now that the amount collected in the last fifteen days compared with the fifteen days of May, 1878, will reach an increase of $3,000,000. The statements just referred to are:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WARRANT DIVISION, May 3, 1879.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., May 6 1879.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of this date, I have to inform you that the receipts from customs—

From May 1st to 6th, inclusive, 1878, were	$1,591,173 23
For same period in 1879	1,562,051 22
Less	39,122 01
From internal revenue:
From May 1st to 6th, inclusive, 1878	$2,922,228 43
For same period in 1879	4,246,016 71
Excess	1,323,788 28

Very respectfully,

J. T. POWER,
Chief of Warrant Division.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK,
United States Senate.

What is the cause of it? Because the reduction of the tobacco tax that we were told was going to lose so much and cripple the Government so greatly and require them to issue bonds if we took it off, has worked advantageously, the producer of tobacco is getting a living price now, instead of a starvation price as he did before; and my word for it the amount of tobacco that will be produced, the prosperity that will come to the man who is raising it because of the low tax imposed on it, the revenues of the Government even at sixteen cents a pound will in the next fiscal year be up to, if it does not exceed, what was received from it at twenty-four cents. In two years it certainly will; and so it is every time you reduce taxation you increase revenue. I could take the silk manufacture in America as an illustration, if I had time, and demonstrate what I say, but I will not. Indeed, I confess that I am speaking now on subjects not germane to this bill. I will only say we consume over $70,000,000 of silk and mixed-silk goods. With a tariff of 60 per cent. the tax on the consumer is $42,000,000 a year; the Treasury gets $13,000,000. For whose benefit is the tax imposed? A few artificial establishments in one corner.

The raw silk is free, and 60 per cent. is the duty on the product, making 120 per cent. in fact, and we get $13,000,000 of revenue; whereas if there was none produced in the United States—and we might as well protect the production of lemons and oranges in New Hampshire and Vermont in competition with Cuba and Florida as to undertake to protect the production of silk in this country in competition with France—$42,000,000 would be the revenue on the $70,000,000 of imports at 60 per cent. I repeat, we are getting $13,000,000. We could afford to-day to buy a farm and pay a thousand dollars apiece to the head of every family engaged in silk manufacturing; we should treble the revenue every year after you had bought them off with the tax that the people are now paying. So it is with a great many other things.

I will call attention to another fact, that is, the inequalities that exist as to the employés in all the Departments of the Government. I understand the Senator from Ohio desires to speak in a few minutes; therefore I will only refer to this one additional thing.

Mr. THURMAN. Go on.

Mr. BECK. One minute. I have gone through with what I desired to say about the bill and have got off on something else. There was a provision made a few years ago that the appointments in the Treasury should be so arranged as to be equally distributed among the several States of the United States, the Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to population. It so happened that one poor fellow from Kentucky, who had been once unfortunate enough to get a place in one of the auditors' offices, had been discharged, and he sought to be restored to his place. He was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. Crittenden, indorsed by Garrett Davis, Mr. Moorhead, and by all the men from Kentucky in the Senate and the House at that time. He had the credentials of all the officials in the Department as a competent and faithful officer. I looked over the Blue Book for 1876, and I saw there was no man from Kentucky there; there was hardly any in any Department of the Government. I saw we had one librarian somewhere by the name of Russell, from Massachusetts, charged to Kentucky; I never heard of him. About the only eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk we had in the Treasury was a man by the name of Charles P. Sumner, also from Massachusetts, charged to Kentucky. Perhaps he was a Kentuckian, but I never heard of him either. There were one or two others. I thought under the law we ought to get this man back, but I was told there were no vacancies, and I so reported to him. The Second Auditor was the man I thought might take him, Mr. E. B. French, a very good man and a first-rate officer. The Kentucky delegation indorsed his petition. We called attention to the law, saying that we had nothing in his office, hardly any in the Interior Department, only one colored man in the War Department, not a single one in the Navy Department, hardly any anywhere; and when I looked over the Blue Book for 1876—I did not happen to have the last one with me—I found that we had about twelve or fourteen men and women, black and white, all told; but how was the State of Maine? I happened to look at that first. Mr. French coming from that State, Maine had ninety in the Treasury Department alone, although she had less than half our population. They were drawing out of the Treasury of the United States for the employment of persons in the Treasury Department, according to the Blue Book of 1876, $129,920, and in the other Departments there was at least a quarter of a million dollars paid to citizens of the State of Maine annually as salaries in these Departments, to say nothing of what she gets out of the custom-houses, having twelve out of thirteen where the salaries amount to more than the receipts. But in Mr. French's office the amount was $26,000; A. F. Wright at $2,100; Charles Lowell at $1,800; W. A. Moorhead, $1,600; T. P. Keene, $1,600; H. A. Higgins, $1,600, and so on, and so on, making in that single bureau of the Second Auditor's Office from the State of Maine $26,100 paid; yet the whole Kentucky delegation could not get a man from Kentucky a place who had been in the Department for twenty or thirty years, with a large family, who was about to be sold out to pay liens for city improvements on his house. He could get no employment, because it was said there was no room for him. What is the use of a law requiring the States to have an equal proportion, with ninety employés from the State of Maine, twenty-odd in the Second Auditor's Office, and Kentucky could not get one because there was no room for him. He was competent, proved to be so, certified to be so. These are things that perhaps ought to be looked into by the committees, if the law is to be obeyed.

But I beg pardon. I have somewhat delayed the Senator from Ohio, I fear. I now desire to call attention to the fact that there was an amendment pending to the bill offered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope it will be voted on.

Mr. BECK. Let it be considered pending, and let the Senator from Ohio go on.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to have the vote taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) Is there objection to taking the vote now?

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to be heard upon the amendment before the vote is taken.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMPTON. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield for a moment to a privileged question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I did not hear, the other day, the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] wherein he referred to me. In the RECORD to-day, I have read those remarks, and I simply wish to correct one error into which he has fallen. It is where he states that I had placed in the platform of the democratic party in 1868 the words declaring that the reconstruction acts were unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void. I have time and again denied that I said that; I have proved that I did not say that; and I am sure that the Senator did not wish to do me injustice. Had I put those words in the platform I should certainly have stood by them and acknowledged them; but I, simply as an historical fact, state that I did not put those words in the platform.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I certainly did not desire to do the Senator injustice, and I will state to him the authority on which I made the statement, and I never had seen his denial of it. During that campaign I cut from the public prints of the day the following, which purported to be a speech of the honorable Senator, in which the paper reporting him used this language:

> When the resolutions offered by the Senator from Maryland, which declared that the rights of suffrage belonged to the political powers of a State were being considered I begged to add a few simple words. They agreed, and I took the resolutions which you will find embodied in the platform, and added to them, "and we declare that the reconstruction acts of Congress are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void." [Cheers.]
> That was my plank in the platform. I wanted nothing else, for when the great democratic party had pledged themselves to that, when they had declared that these acts were unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void, I was willing to wait in patience until that party would be triumphant and apply the remedy in their own good time.

I know not whether that was correct; but of course if the Senator says it was not, I accept the explanation. I saw him in his seat at the time I made the speech, and regret he did not correct it then so that his correction could go out in my speech.

Mr. HAMPTON. I did not hear the Senator's remark, or I should have corrected it at the time. As to the speech to which he refers I cannot say whether I used those words or not. I think it probable I did, but if I did use them, it was in the sense that this was a plank in the platform that I approved of, and in that sense my plank. I only state now the fact that I did not put those words in the platform. The Senator on the right of the Senator from Minnesota, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] heard my explanation, on one occasion, of all these facts and I showed him then documents in connection therewith, on an examination by a committee, the kuklux committee I think, when he was in South Carolina.

I only wished to make the disclaimer for the vindication of "the truth of history."

Mr. WINDOM. I do not understand, then, that the Senator now denies having made the speech from which I read; but if he does, that is all the authority I had on the point.

Mr. THURMAN addressed the Senate. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion a moment. The Senator who has charge of the bill is not in the Senate, and it is hardly proper that the Senate should adjourn in his absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and eleven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 15, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2000) declaratory of the meaning of the act approved February 19, 1879, entitled "An act for the payment of the officers and soldiers of the Mexican war of the three months' extra pay provided for by the act of July 19, 1848;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PETITION FROM CITIZENS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask unanimous consent to present a petition of legislative and executive officers and citizens of Pennsylvania setting forth their views on the existing condition of public affairs and praying for the enactment of laws which will secure and maintain the peace and safety of the Government; and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE and Mr. KILLINGER objected.

Mr. CLYMER. If that right is denied me, of course I will have to present the petition in the ordinary way; but it comes from a body of senators and members of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, and is a respectful paper, containing their views upon this subject.

Mr. WHITE. It comes from a minority of the Legislature of my State.

Mr. CLYMER. Suppose they are a minority?

Mr. WHITE. Very well, I object to it.

Mr. CLYMER. Then I withdraw the petition and will place it in the petition-box.

STEAMBOAT NEW ERA NO. 5.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2001) to authorize the payment of prize-money to the captors of the steamboat New Era No. 5 and cargo; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock. The unfinished business coming over from yesterday is the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with amendments. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I would make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, or the member of the committee who has the bill in charge, and that is, to take this bill out of the morning hour, so as to enable other committees to make their reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] suggests that the bill, being unfinished in the morning hour, be allowed to take its place after the morning hour in the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to say that I have the bill in charge and that I am opposed to that motion, for if the bill be taken out of the morning hour some other bill may antagonize it.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If it be understood that no other business will interfere with it after the morning hour, I shall have no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I shall object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] has eight minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think he has twenty minutes remaining; it was so announced yesterday.

Mr. CLYMER. I happened to occupy the chair at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday, and my recollection is that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] has twenty minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman will proceed for twenty minutes.

Mr. ORTH. I do not think I shall occupy the whole time, but inasmuch as my time is limited I shall be under the necessity of declining to yield to any interruption.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will so understand it.

Mr. ORTH. In my remarks yesterday in the morning hour and just before its expiration I had referred the House to sundry decisions of the Federal courts sustaining the position which I have taken, that this legislation, the right of the General Government to transfer its causes to the Federal courts, is entirely within the constitutional power of Congress. I shall this morning follow that line of argument by referring to decisions from State courts.

I hold in my hand the seventy-seventh volume of the reports of the supreme court of North Carolina, and I find two decisions in those reports made within the last two years, adjudicated cases upon the law now under consideration. The local courts of North Carolina indicted persons for offenses against the criminal laws of the State, and application was made by the defendants for the removal or transfer of their cases to the Federal courts, on the ground that the acts alleged in the indictments were committed by them in their position of United States officials and in the line of their duty. The application was granted in the inferior courts in both cases. The question, however, was taken by the attorney-general of North Carolina to the supreme court of the State, upon the ruling of the court below that the cases were transferable under the act of Congress. When the cases came to the supreme court, which consists of five judges—a chief-justice and four associates—the matter was fully and thoroughly argued. The whole question was considered, and I regard this decision as exceedingly valuable in the discussion and consideration of this question, not only because it was the adjudication of the State court yielding to the supreme authority of the General Government, but it was a State court in a section of the country where it would be natural, if anywhere, to look to a strict construction of the act of Congress, and probably a denial of the right of the General Government in the premises.

I will detain the House but a few moments by reading a portion of the decision of this court. I would remark here, that while the court was composed of five judges there was only one dissenting opinion—four judges concurring in the opinion that was delivered by one of the associate judges. The principal and leading case was decided at the June term of 1877, being the case of the State against Hoskins, and is to be found in volume 77, North Carolina Reports, page 532. The court use this language:

> We have seen that Congress has power "to lay and collect taxes" and "to pass all laws necessary and proper to execute the power," and a law has been passed and an officer appointed to execute it, and that officer says he has been resisted. Now, must not the United States protect its officer? What is the use of the power to lay the tax and to appoint the officer if he may not be protected? It is no answer to this to say he may be protected when he does right, but not when he does wrong; for how can the United States know whether he has done right or wrong unless she can try him, and how can she try him unless he be delivered up on demand? It would seem to be too plain for discussion that the right to protect the officer is indispensable to the service and inseparable from the power of the government which appoints him. Nor is it an answer to say that the State will protect him if he deserves protection; for no one ever heard that one government could trust the execution of its laws or the control of its officers to another government, however friendly. Governments could not remain friendly upon such relations.

And again:

> And the act in question, substantially in the same form as now, having been upon our statute-book for a half century, and repeatedly considered and never having been declared void by any court or text writer, it would have been a judicial adventure to make a conflict of jurisdiction between the State and the United States courts.
> The United States is not a foreign government. It is our government, as much so as North Carolina is; we are represented in it, and we are its citizens. It can protect its citizens, it can punish its officers, and it can repeal bad laws. How puerile then it is to regard the United States as a "foreign" government, and to look to North Carolina or any other government to protect us against its oppression! As well might we appeal to Virginia to protect us against the aggressions of North Carolina.

That decision covers the entire ground assumed by those of us who say that there should be no change in the present law providing for the transfer of criminal causes from the State to the Federal courts, in which there is a Federal ingredient, or which arise under questions growing out of the execution of our revenue laws.

I wish now to summarize or formulate the propositions which I have brought to the attention of the House during this discussion. And as I understand the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] is to follow me, I respectfully call his attention to these propositions:

1. The right of the United States under the Constitution, to have all questions arising out of or affecting her laws decided by her own courts.

2. The exercise of this jurisdiction is not only proper but necessary in order to preserve her own independence and supremacy.

3. That the laws of Congress now and heretofore in force providing for the transfer of all causes, in which there is a "Federal ingredient," are in accordance with the Constitution and have been so recognized by the uniform decisions of the courts for a period of over sixty years.

4. That such transfer of both civil and criminal cases carries with it, as an inseparable incident, the laws of the State so far as applicable and necessary, from whose courts such transfer has been made.

5. If such "incident" does not accompany the transfer, then Congress has the right to attach it by appropriate legislation.

6. That Congress has on divers occasions exercised the right of such legislation.

7. That if these propositions are untenable, then the United States has no power to protect its officers in the discharge of duties imposed upon them by its legislation, and is at the mercy of any State government which may in its discretion enforce or disregard the laws of the United States.

8. The reverse of those propositions would effectually destroy the sovereignty of the United States and make the several States of the Union not only independent of, but supreme over, the General Government, thus practically endangering if not destroying its very existence.

A government which cannot enforce the collection of its revenues is thereby deprived of its chief attribute of sovereignty. If it must depend upon the comity of another government for the exercise or enjoyment of any of its rights, it ceases to have that vitality which is necessary to its existence.

The language of Chief-Justice Marshall in the case of Osborn vs. The Bank of the United States, 9 Wheaton, 847, is most appropriate to this occasion:

> If a State shall impose a fine or penalty on any person employed in the execution of any law of the United States, it may levy that fine or penalty by a ministerial officer without the sanction even of its own courts. * * * The carrier of the mail, the collector of the revenue, the marshal of a district, the recruiting officer, may all be inhibited under ruinous penalties from the performance of their respective duties.
> Each member of the Union is capable at its will of attacking the nation, of arresting its progress at every step, of acting rigorously and effectually in the execution of its designs, while the nation stands naked, stripped of its defensive armor, and incapable of shielding or executing its laws.

Now, I grant you that this legislation, casually considered, may be regarded as anomalous. The truth is that our whole system of government, national and State, is an anomaly; but it strikes me that each can perform its proper function, move in its own orbit, without overstepping the boundaries allotted to it by the Constitution and the laws of the land, and that a closer examination and study of our apparently complex system of government, State and national, will be seen to be entirely harmonious and consistent, one part with another; that there is no real conflict, and need be none, for the national and State governments move in separate orbits, and their respective spheres are clearly defined by organic law, and its exposition by competent authority.

While I am thus pleading for the rights of the General Government in this respect, I would not for one moment infringe upon the proper rights of any of the States of this Union. They can exist together, as they have existed together, without serious conflict or danger. Let it be understood, and let us so act, both in our public and private capacity, that we hold to the doctrine that this is an indestructible Union, and recognizing also that it is composed of indestructible States. Let it be known that this Government of ours is composed of many as the billows, but is nevertheless one as the sea. For one hundred years it has diffused its benefits and blessings, making us the happiest and most prosperous people upon God's green earth. Let us all join in the invocation that this good Government of ours, handed down as a rich heritage from our ancestors, may be transmitted by us unimpaired and untarnished to our children and our children's children to "the last syllable of recorded time." [Applause.]

Mr. MCLANE. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that this question should have been in any way confounded or confused with the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.] In the few remarks I have to address to the House I hope that question will be understood to be entirely aside from the discussion. The question presented by this bill is now properly before the House. Whatever might have been the merits of the point of order if it had been originally made, the House, by its reference of the bill and by the subsequent reporting of the bill for consideration, has disposed of the point of order. We have now before us the proposition itself upon its merits; and certainly no gentleman who has listened to the remarks just closed or to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] on yesterday and the day before can doubt that we have before us for consideration one of the most important questions in principle as well as in detail that could be possibly presented for our consideration.

Now I have no time to exchange with my friend who has just closed [Mr. ORTH] any professions of devotion either to the rights of the States or to the rights of the United States. Whatever those rights are they are well defined in the Constitution of the United States, and the professions of no man are entitled to any respect if he seeks to give either to the General Government or to the State governments powers not conferred by the Constitution. No matter how high may be the character of the individual, no matter how loud may be his professions of devotion to his country, he must be judged by the letter of the law; and if he seeks to give to the Federal Government any power which is not expressly granted or which by legitimate and just construction is not in the terms of the Constitution "necessary and proper" to execute some express power, or in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, appropriate to that end, he ceases to have any right to stand upon this floor or before the people as the champion either of the rights of the United States or of the rights of the States.

The question we have now to consider is, in my judgment, as simple as the letter of the Constitution itself. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States is expressly defined in the Constitution. Nothing beyond the provisions of that instrument can be assumed by the Congress of the United States. Tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court of the United States may be organized by Congress, but no powers can be conferred upon these inferior courts greater than those possessed by the superior court. No lawyer, no layman, can suppose that after the Constitution has defined the judicial power of the United States, Congress, because it has the power to create an inferior tribunal, can give to such a court greater power than the Supreme Court itself possesses by the letter of the Constitution. That is the issue, and the only issue, presented by this bill.

So far as the civil jurisdiction is concerned, we have it defined in the Constitution; and until after the year 1866 no attempt was made by any Congress to extend that power. Where an alien was concerned, or where the suit was between citizens of different States, the laws of Congress provided for the transfer of suits from the State courts; and that is the only power which the Constitution of the United States concedes to the judicial department of the United States.

In 1866 and in 1867 and in 1875 we went along, doubtless with a good intent and object, but influenced by the education and habits of the day. No gentleman on either side of this House need be told that during the years from 1865 to 1875 we legislated for this country according to the spirit of our own age, and not at all according to the spirit of our fathers. We dealt with a very different condition of affairs. We had been involved in five years of civil war. All the principles, all the theories of the Constitution were swept away by war, and no man, North or South, during those years of war or for years subsequent—I say it without any fear of reproach—escaped being influenced in his views of constitutional authority by that war. The habits of thought and action originating in the war have still their full force in this legislation to-day. There is not to be found a man in active life in this country who does not allow the lessons, the experience, the habits, and the legislation of the war to influence him still. But I shall not upon this occasion, or indeed upon any occasion, address to this House any sentimental appeal having reference to that war.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. MCLANE. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I agree with the gentleman entirely in the view that in the past we have gone too far in extending the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and allowing the transfer of cases from the State courts. I think that the time has now come when we can and ought to correct this matter. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman whether he has examined the bill reported to this House from the Judiciary Committee at the last session by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. CULBERSON,] touching this matter?

Mr. MCLANE. I have not.

Mr. FRYE. I think that if the gentleman had examined that bill he would have been entirely satisfied that the Judiciary Committee, after an examination of nearly two months, did all that was necessary to be done in relation to this question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] I introduced in the last Congress, virtually, with some amendments, the same bill which is now pending, and it was referred to the Judiciary Committee. That bill did not in any manner whatever touch the original jurisdiction of the Federal courts. It related alone to the removal of causes from State courts into the Federal courts. The Judiciary Committee brought before the House during last Congress a bill alluded to by the gentleman from Maine, which limited the original jurisdiction of the Federal courts by raising the minimum of a certain class of cases to the amount of $2,000. The bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary did not directly affect the law in regard to the removal of causes from the State into the Federal courts; it was different from the bill I had introduced and hardly of the same nature. The gentleman reporting the bill may have remarked that it was intended as a substitute for my own and other bills, but it did not make it so by calling it a substitute. If they had brought that bill in and said it was a substitute for a bill to repeal the election laws, that would not have made it a substitute for such a bill. The point I make is this, that the bill brought in by the Judiciary Committee in the last Congress was not of the same nature as the bill now under consideration, or of the bill I introduced into the last Congress.

Mr MCLANE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I might perhaps like the bill to which the gentleman from Maine has referred better than this, quite possibly so, but I have never seen it. But what is material to me, and I think to the House, is whether this bill we are now considering is perfectly satisfactory. I think it is. Certainly it has nothing in it to which any just exception has been taken. It may not go as far as it ought to go. I for one do not think it does. I have upon my table two other bills which have been introduced into the Senate at this session having the object this bill has, which I greatly prefer to this bill. They reach some cases that this bill does not reach, but in the main, both as to the civil cases which may now be transferred from the State to the Federal courts and the criminal cases which may be transferred, I am content with this bill, and I shall not occupy the attention of the House longer than to indicate its character as I understand it.

Now, the greatest interest affected by this in the civil cases which may be removed I suppose to be the insurance cases. They have occupied considerable attention in this debate and they certainly bring a greater influence into this discussion than any other class of cases, although the provisions of the bill equally affect all cases where the amount exceeds $500. I cannot conceive any insurance company going into a State which should not be subject to the laws of that State. In my own State we permit no insurance company to establish an agency there that does not permit a visitation from the State annually into the most minute transactions, and we never would allow any foreign insurance company—I mean by foreign any insurance company of another State or another country—to come into our State which does not subject itself to the police power of the State, and no State in this Union will permit an insurance company to establish an agency within its limits upon any other terms. Every other State has laws of the same tenor, differing only in the labor and intelligence which may have been applied in their enactment, and in all those laws the power and jurisdiction of the State are amply recognized.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, these cases, which excite now the major part of the interest involved in opposition to this bill, are cases which in a great degree oppress the people of the States where these insurance companies have their agencies. What can be more monstrous, sir, than for any company, whether it be a foreign company, properly so called, or a company of a sister State, to take the citizen of the State whose life or property has been insured from his own home or his own district, from the spot where the evidence is to be found, where the property itself is situated, where the life, while there was life, resided, to carry him first of all to the center of the State, to the circuit court, and then in the last degree from the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States in the city of Washington. The grievance of detail is more odious to me infinitely than the vicious principle involved in the bill, and I shall address myself to both those points as paramount in our consideration.

It is essential in the last degree, Mr. Speaker, that the experience we have had in war and in peace should not be lost. Every true patriot is ready to accept the Constitution, the last amendment as sacred and as obligatory as the first, amendments ingrafted upon it and sealed with the blood of the country, North and South, but one no more and no less sacred than the other. Just as before the war I would have insisted upon the obligation of every man to respect the whole Constitution so I do now. Whatever there has been of evil in this country, whatever there has been of corruption, results from indifference to constitutional restraints and limitations, and God knows this corruption has reached from the lowest to the highest seats of power; we have reached the point when there is no branch of our Government which has not been corrupted by the power and the wealth and the influence of the Federal Government. Now more than ever, more than before the war, is it our duty to defend the instrument itself and not seek to enlarge it either to the prejudice of the States or of the people.

In reference to the question of State rights, properly considered, they are defined in the Constitution of the United States, and it is in the Constitution of the United States that I look for the rights of the States as well as for the rights of the United States. If there ever was a case clear to me it is that that law of 1866, and still more the law of 1875, invaded the constitutional rights of the States. Now, Mr. Speaker, is it wise, is it reasonable, for us to exert ourselves in every conceivable way to degrade the States?

Why, sir, I sat here the other day and heard applause to the echo because honorable gentlemen said that this or that application of the principle elevated the power of the United States. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen need not concern themselves about the power of the United States. There is no greater power to-day known among men in government, and I thank God for it, than the power of the United States; power at home and power abroad. But do you think, sir, that that reconciles me to men on either side of this House who would abuse that power, who would use the power which was given to protect and defend the States first, and then the people of the States. I say the States first, and I follow the words of the Constitution.

All power not granted to the United States is reserved to the States or to the people.

And I am indulging in no extravagance when I say that the whole course of our legislation from 1866 till now, till to-day, goes to increase, magnify, exaggerate even the power of the Federal Government as against the power of the States, and nowhere so insidiously, nowhere so dangerously, as in these very sections which it is now proposed to repeal.

Why, what would our fathers have thought of a citizen of the United States being indicted in a United States court for violation of the common law; not a State statute, not a United States statute, but a violation of the common law? And I need not say to any man that the United States has no common-law jurisdiction. My honorable friend from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] would not question that proposition. Whatever he might think about the power of the General Government to keep the peace he would admit that the Government of the United States has no common-law jurisdiction. And yet one of those sections of the Revised Statutes which this bill repeals permits the Federal court to take out of the jurisdiction of a State court a citizen of the State indicted for an offense at the common law, and then to try him in the United States court under the indictment found in the State court. Why, sir, a more monstrous proceeding, one more unconstitutional, more vicious, and more oppressive to the citizen, cannot be conceived of.

Now that case has occurred in my own State, a much worse case, an infinitely worse case has occurred in the sister Commonwealth of Virginia where not only her citizens, but her judges, her judicial officers have been carried to a Federal court for trial, under State law too, because in those cases in Virginia under the Federal statutes as well as the common law principle an offense was committed.

Now, as I understand this bill, it brings us back—and if I am not perfectly correct in my statement I ask the learned gentleman who has just concluded his argument to correct me—as I understand this bill it brings us back to where the law stood in 1866.

Mr. ORTH rose.

Mr. ROBESON. May I ask the gentleman from Maryland a question?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Maryland yield?

Mr. MCLANE. I have asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] a question, and yield to him that he may answer it.

Mr. ORTH. The law now sought to be repealed by the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND,] and now under consideration, relates back to the statute of 1833, modified and changed in some respects by the law of 1865. But it goes further, and repeals all laws upon the subject of transferring criminal cases from State to Federal courts. That would be the effect of the law if passed.

Mr. MCLANE. All laws except those which relate to the alien, which are not repealed—all laws except those relating to suits against an alien and suits brought by the citizen of one State against citizens of another State. Those laws remain in force, as I understand this bill.

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCLANE. And they ought to remain in force.

Mr. ORTH. That remains; and I will say if this bill which is now under consideration should pass it will deprive the General Government of the power of transferring any cause arising under the civil-rights law, the revenue law, or the elective-franchise law.

Mr. MCLANE. I have no doubt about that. Those laws were all passed after 1865.

Mr. ORTH. Except the revenue laws.

Mr. MCLANE. This does not interfere with the revenue law, as I understand it.

Now, I say to the gentleman from Indiana, and the point is very distinct, there is no interference whatever with the power to transfer a cause where an alien is sued or where the suit is between citizens of different States. And I support the bill cordially because it permits no other transfer at all. That is exactly its merit. I begin with that year 1865, I begin with those laws known as the civil-rights laws and known as the enforcement law. They are unconstitutional laws now by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States. They were unconstitutional laws before in the judgment of every man who was not blinded by patriotism or partisanship. [Laughter.] Oh, I used the term without intending to give you more credit than you deserve; but I wish to avoid any offense to you. My honorable friend before me who smiles must not think I used the term inadvertently. From one end of the northern country to the other and throughout the South wherever there was found a Union man he felt it his duty to strengthen the power of the Federal Government. That is the sense in which I spoke and it is not offensive to any man. That was the spirit throughout the North and throughout the South wherever partisans in the South could be found in favor of the Union. Why, sir, I need not go further than my own State. The most extravagant and ultra demands that ever were made upon this Government were made by southern men. In my own State, if I may be permitted to refer to it, petitions were addressed to the President of the United States, or the Congress of the United States, to drive out of Maryland every man who sympathized with the war of the rebellion, regardless of home, of wife and children, and regardless of property.

Now, I suppose that men blinded by patriotism or blinded by passion, it is not for me to say which, tore to pieces and trampled upon the Constitution of the United States. I am not to follow their example now. We are not assembled here to try each other or to judge each other's motives or to stigmatize each other. I should be loath to stigmatize the North, and I assure you that I am not disposed to stigmatize the South, because then and now it had all my sympathies and all my affections that could be extended to it in view of my duty to the country and my fidelity to the Constitution of the United States. I never gave it any more and I never gave it any less.

This episode, Mr. Speaker, is intended for my friend before me, who seemed to think that my appeal to the patriotism of the House was not intended for him. It was as fully intended for him as any word I have said to him, and if I could make an appeal effectually to the other side of the House it would be to pass this bill, because it puts us back where we were before the war, where every want of the Federal Government was fully met. I cannot think of anything which could be desired on either side which was not fully provided for by the law as it stood prior to 1866. That law gave the fullest development to the Constitution of the United States. We lived under it successfully for seventy years.

I say with perfect confidence that you cannot perfect your Federal judiciary by adding to the number of judges or to their authority. You have a Supreme Court to-day which, however able it may be, in its results certainly does not compare to the disadvantage of its predecessors. You have a number of cases before the Supreme Court which defy all their industry. The only remedy suggested is that you shall increase the number of the court or create an entirely new court between the circuit court and the Supreme Court. There are thousands of cases—I dare not name the number—undisposed of in the United States courts to-day, and why is it? It is simply because these very statutes that we now propose to repeal send to the United States courts every conceivable case for their consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] a question.

Mr. MCLANE. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman until he has passed from his political discussion.

Mr. MCLANE. That is all through.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understood him to say that if this bill were passed it would place us back in the condition we were in prior to 1865. Perhaps I may have misunderstood him. I want to know, if he says that this bill will place us back in the condition of law prior to 1865, why does the gentleman wish to repeal section 639, which was the act of 1789, and has been the law of this country ever since?

Mr. MCLANE. Because it is in my judgment unconstitutional as now construed and modified by the acts of 1866 and 1875.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not understand that section 639 is unconstitutional.

Mr. MCLANE. It is so, practically.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman seems to be discussing the merits of the bill. When a cause has been commenced in a State court which now may be removed to a United States court why should it not be carried to the Supreme Court as well as in suits between citizens of different States?

Mr. MCLANE. I answer you, first, because one of the parties has accepted the jurisdiction of the State court.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the other has not accepted it.

Mr. MCLANE. The one has, and we are dealing with both.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why may not a cause which is pending in the State courts now be reviewed in the United States courts between citizens of different States as well as if it had been commenced in a United States court? Where is the difference in principle?

Mr. MCLANE. One has accepted the jurisdiction.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the other has not.

Mr. MCLANE. The one has and we are dealing with both. The section to which the gentleman refers simply prevents a party from transferring the suit when he has permitted the cause to go to trial in the State court.

Mr. ROBINSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If he will look at the first clause of section 639 he will see that it does not allow a party to go on to final trial and hearing.

Mr. MCLANE. In the discussion of the constitutionality of the act, I was not referring to section 639 as unconstitutional in itself. I was referring only to criminal prosecutions, and the gentleman so understood it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not at all. May I ask another question?

Mr. MCLANE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why should section 639, the first clause of that section enacting the provisions of the law of 1789, be now repealed? And why not for the same reason repeal section 629, which gives power to go into the United States court as provided in the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. MCLANE. The section to which the gentleman refers relates to suits brought against an alien or by a citizen of the State in which suit is brought against a citizen of another State, and provides that the suit may be removed on the petition of such defendant filed in the State court at the time of entering appearance in the State court. That was the original provision as it existed prior to 1866.

Mr. ROBINSON. And from 1789.

Mr. McLANE. This bill does not repeal that section. The gentleman will find upon examination that it only repeals so much of it as requires him to file his petition for the transfer at the time he files his appearance.

Mr. ROBINSON. The first section of this bill provides "that section 639 and 647 of chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the removal of causes from State courts into the circuit courts of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed." I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] to that matter because I thought he was overlooking it in his argument.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] will allow me, I will answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. McLANE. I will do so.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The bill does provide for the repeal of the whole of section 639, which embraces the twelfth section of the act of 1789, the acts of 1866, 1867, and 1875. In addressing the House the other day I gave the reasons that moved the majority of the committee to the repeal of the whole of section 639. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] has been discussing sections 641 and 643, which we in this bill propose to modify by eliminating from those sections the authority to remove criminal causes from the State courts to the Federal courts.

Mr. ROBINSON. In answering my question I desire the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to keep entirely to the matter of civil process. I am not asking now about criminal cases.

I say that the first section of this bill repeals absolutely section 639. It therefore not only carries down the legislation of 1865 and of subsequent years, about which I am not now speaking, but it also carries down the parent legislation of 1789, legislation almost as old as the Constitution itself. I suppose that my friend from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] does not want to see that ancient landmark cut down.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] will allow me to answer further, I will say that the day before yesterday I devoted nearly an hour to assigning the reasons which moved the committee in desiring to repeal the whole of section 639.

I will very briefly summarize some of the points I then made. One of the reasons that moved the committee to ask the repeal of that section was this: the Federal courts to-day are overcrowded, and, as the Attorney-General of the United States informs us, are unable to transact the business that comes into the courts; and he has recommended the erection of an intermediate court, with all its expensive machinery, also the appointment of an additional number of judges on the circuit benches. Now, as a very large portion of the business which reaches the Federal courts is brought into them by the removal of causes from State courts, any one can see that the repeal of the authority to transfer causes from the State courts will very probably remedy the evil and save the enormously additional expense.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is answering my question only by the courtesy of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] who is entitled to the floor, I do not want to have him repeat his speech of the other day. It was undoubtedly a very good speech, but I do not think that many of our speeches here will bear repetition. I followed the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] very closely, and I noticed that he dealt very little with the original act of 1789, but he magnified and intensified the desire to repeal the later laws. I am not talking about them. I say there is no difference of principle by which you can ask for the repeal of the first clause of section 639, enacted in 1789, that will not also require the repeal of section 629, that formed a part of that same old law. I think there is no gentleman here who will claim that there is any difference of principle.

Now, if you want to get at the legislation of 1865 and 1872, go at that alone and do not bring in something else with it. I believe the course of this debate will show that we are going here in a blind way. I claim to be just as fully a Union man as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] is now or ever has been, but I do not think that has anything to do with the question of repealing the law of 1789.

That old law has been upon the statute-book, and the gentleman says we lived under it for seventy years before there was any "unpleasantness." Now, somebody here in the current language of the debates of this House wants to "tear out" some of the leaves of the statute-book. "Tear out the leaves;" I hear that expression here every day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Allow me to reply——

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman from Illinois is through with his reply.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am not; I had hardly commenced when you took me off the floor with your speech.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want a reply to my question; that is all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will give it. This bill does provide for the repeal of the whole of section 639. The other day I devoted a large portion of my remarks to the discussion of the evils which have grown up under the first clause of section 639, and which embodies the twelfth section of the judiciary act of 1789. I will now restate some of those evils. The twelfth section of the judiciary act of 1789 confines the right of removal alone to non-defendants, where all the defendants concur. The law stood in that shape from 1789 down to 1866. There were not so many abuses growing up under that law as have since it was coupled with the acts of 1866 and others. The Federal courts had not so extensively resorted to that liberality of construction to which they have in the last few years. For this reason the people did not make very bitter or serious complaint. They seem to regard it best to suffer the evils than to engage in agitation for repeal. It is true that Mr. Jefferson as far back as 1820 predicted dangers arising from the power of the Federal judiciary to the very existence of the Government. At one time he wrote:

> The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working under the ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric.

How? By means of construction and congressional action. It is rapidly destroying the constitutional balance of our Government. In shaping this bill I provided for the repeal of the whole of section 639. I was striking at a dangerous principle.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is not the same principle embraced in section 629?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No, sir; section 629 relates to the original jurisdiction of the courts, and does not affect the principle found in section 639.

Mr. ROBINSON. Section 629 gives the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction of civil causes between parties one of whom is an alien, and between parties who are citizens of different States.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My friend from Massachusetts wholly misconceives the nature of this bill. It has nothing to do with section 629. That section relates to the original jurisdiction of the courts. This relates only to the removal of causes from State courts.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think I am wrong about this matter. As the gentleman says he is fighting a principle, I ask him why he does not fight the same principle as embraced in 629?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Because it does not appear in section 629. The principle at which I strike has no reference to the original jurisdiction of the courts. It relates to the power of the Federal courts to go into the State courts and take from their docket cases which have been instituted there and over which they have acquired jurisdiction. This bill, in seeking to repeal section 639, strikes at that principle.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why should not a defendant have precisely the same rights that a plaintiff has?

Mr. GARFIELD and others. That is the point.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman repeat his question?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Constitution of the United States provides that the Federal courts shall have jurisdiction of cases between citizens of different States. Now, why should not a defendant have the same rights under that constitutional provision and the laws in pursuance thereof that a plaintiff has? The gentleman says that it applies to insurance companies. I do not care anything about insurance companies; but if a company of that kind as plaintiff may go into the United States court in the State of Illinois and institute a proceeding against the gentleman himself, why should not the company have the right as a defendant, when a suit is brought against it by the gentleman, to go into the same United States court?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman. Under the first clause of section 639, which was the twelfth section of the act of 1789, the Supreme Court of the United States, in my judgment, arrogated to itself power which was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. The Constitution of the United States provided that in the class of cases embraced in section 630 "citizens" and "aliens" might remove the cause into the Federal courts, but does not give corporations that right. The Supreme Court, in order to give them that privilege, has rendered it necessary to change the definition of the word "citizen." It has decided that a corporation, a mere fiction of law, for this purpose is clothed with the attributes of citizenship. In consequence of that decision, made under and by virtue of the first clause of section 639—the twelfth section of the judiciary act of 1789—it has become almost impossible to retain on the dockets of the State courts any case against railroad companies, insurance companies, or other corporations. Corporations by means of that law can drive their antagonists away from their homes, away from their State tribunals, and compel them at heavy expense and great inconvenience to litigate in the Federal courts. Again, that law gives the Federal judiciary a pretext for encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the State courts, and thereby endangers a conflict between the State and Federal judicial powers which may some day imperil the public peace, if not hazard the safety of the present form of our government. Again, the removal of causes from the State to the Federal courts greatly adds to the inconvenience and expense of litigants in the State courts. This is very unjust to the citizens of the State where the legal proceedings are pending.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a point of order. The morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will suspend. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] makes the point of order that the morning hour has expired. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McLANE. I would like to have five minutes to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] has been interrupted a good deal; I think the House ought to grant him some extension of his time.

Mr. BLOUNT. The bill will come up again to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS. "Regular order!"

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired; and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KILLINGER] that the bill and amendments be laid on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I offered yesterday an amendment to this bill, which I find by the reading of the Journal was entered upon the Journal with the direction that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It should have been so printed.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. The amendment does not appear in the RECORD, and I ask that the necessary correction be made.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be inserted in the proceedings of yesterday as they will be published in the bound edition of the RECORD, and it will also appear in the daily RECORD of to-morrow. It has been omitted through neglect.

The amendment offered by Mr. LOUNSBERY was to strike out the eighth section of the bill, which, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, is as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 254 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 254. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to receive deposits of gold or silver coin and gold or silver bullion, with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor, in denominations of not less than $5 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. And certificates representing coin in the Treasury may be issued in payment of interest on the public debt, which certificates, together with those issued for coin and bullion deposited, shall not at any time exceed 20 per cent. beyond the amount of coin and bullion in the Treasury; and the certificates for coin and bullion in the Treasury shall be received at par in payment for all dues to the United States, including duties on imports, and may be computed as part of the lawful money-reserve of national banks."

The vote was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 109, nays 126, not voting 50; as follows:

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. WALTER A. WOOD, of New York, is paired with Mr. FORSYTHE, of Illinois. Mr. WOOD, if present, would vote "ay."

Mr. CALKINS. I am paired with Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio. If he were here, I would vote "ay."

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. My colleague, Mr. FROST, is paired with Mr. BINGHAM, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBESON. I am paired with Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question. As many as are in favor of seconding the demand for the previous question will say "ay."

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Those of a contrary opinion will say "no."

Mr. CONGER. When I address the Chair I would like to be recognized or to be refused recognition.

The SPEAKER. The House was dividing.

Mr. CONGER. That is the very reason why I addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not entitled to be recognized, but the Chair will hear him.

Mr. CONGER. Very well, then I will not address the Chair. It is the first time such a decision has been made within my recollection.

The SPEAKER stated that the ayes appeared to have it.

Several members called for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 102.

Mr. WARNER and Mr. KENNA called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CLAFLIN and Mr. WARNER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 107.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. STEELE. I ask permission to record my vote on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KILLINGER] to lay this bill on the table.

Mr. PHISTER. I object.

Mr. STEELE. Well, I will state I would have voted "no," if I had been here.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Under the operation of the previous question which has just been voted, I desire to know if any opportunity will be offered hereafter for the presentation of a certain amendment as a substitute for this bill and certain other amendments as substitutes for certain sections that have been proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] and by my colleague from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN.]

The SPEAKER. By an understanding reached yesterday the previous question if seconded would only prevail as against the first section of the bill and the two amendments, if there be amendments pending thereto under the rule.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The rest of the bill of course would be open to amendment and the five-minute debate, as provided for by the rules, unless the House should on the respective sections sustain the previous question and cut off amendments thereto and debate.

Mr. HASKELL. Then I am to understand that a substitute for the entire bill cannot be offered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not say so.

Mr. HASKELL. The Chair stated that the previous question ran only to the first section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not say a substitute for the entire bill would not be in order. The Chair will determine that when it is offered.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to ask now if it would be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never decides what is in order or is not in order in a hypothetical case. He requires to hear the amendment and the time of offering it before deciding whether it is in order.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENNA. I understand the Chair to have alluded to an understanding yesterday as to the effect of seconding the demand for the previous question. Is not the Chair mistaken as to any such understanding having been arrived at? Was it not rather a statement of the Chair growing out of a misunderstanding on the part of the Chair, the Chair supposing that this bill was in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and not in the House in the ordinary way? I would refer the Chair to the resolution by which this bill was made a special order, and which provided that the bill should be considered in the House, and not that it should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. My object in calling attention to this matter is to prevent the delay of further debate and to facilitate final action on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The understanding has been that this bill was to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and on yesterday such understanding was repeated. The subject was then introduced by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who made the proposition, and it was acceded to on all sides without contradiction or query, that this bill should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole; and even if there had been another arrangement prior to that to the contrary the subsequent arrangement should be conclusive on the Chair.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to state the understanding of myself and other gentlemen around me was that the bill was being considered in the House, not in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that the previous question reached the entire bill. That was the effect of the resolution under which the bill was considered.

The SPEAKER. The record shows what the gentleman from Kentucky states to be correct, and yet the Chair thinks there was a subsequent understanding that the bill should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENNA. I desire, with the permission of the Chair, to add just one remark further. So far as I was concerned as a member of the House, and to my knowledge so far as other members were concerned, there was no understanding arrived at yesterday evening further than the statement from the Chair that the bill was in the House as in Committee of the Whole. That was a misapprehension of the fact on the part of the Chair; and I submit that no understanding could take this bill out of the operation of the resolution making it a special order, except an understanding on the part of the whole House; that a mere statement from the Chair growing out of a misapprehension could not do so.

The SPEAKER. The statement yesterday was not made from the chair at all, but on the floor by the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. HASKELL. It was the understanding that amendments should be offered to the bill which gentlemen desired to offer. I voted against laying the bill on the table because I have been in favor, just as rapidly as it can be done, of the full remonetization and unlimited coinage of silver. But I will not vote for the bill as it is before the House now; and I think many gentlemen who refused to lay the bill on the table did so because they supposed that in the consideration of a great financial measure like this, of interest to the entire country, they would have an opportunity of being heard on the provisions contained in the bill. We have had debate on every subsidiary and correlative question relating to finance, but have had little or no debate on the provisions of this bill, which I regard as a monstrosity, and other members regard as a monstrosity, which we will not vote for except it be amended.

Mr. STEPHENS. Several days ago, if I recollect rightly, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] made some statement about the length of the debate, I stated that it was my desire, and he concurred with me if I recollect rightly, that the bill should be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. We all understood that.

Mr. STEPHENS. And that when the previous question was demanded, the bill should then be taken up and considered by sections; that I believe was entered upon the RECORD. That was my understanding, and it never was my intention to cut off debate upon the details of the sections or to prevent amendments being offered according to the parliamentary law—I think those were the very words I used.

The SPEAKER. Any other construction would have prevented and made absolutely useless the offering of amendments and having them printed.

Mr. CLYMER. In the colloquy yesterday between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] having the bill in charge, the gentleman from Illinois suggested an amendment to the eighth section, and it was understood that the gentleman from Ohio gave his assent to the offering of this amendment, and this morning I have understood that the demand for the previous question was to apply only to the first section of the bill, and that when the other sections of the bill came up the previous question was to be demanded upon them. Now, sir, if any other course than that is pursued, I hold that it is a clear—I will not say an intentional—fraud upon the majority of this House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The remedy is to vote down the main question.

Mr. KENNA. I do not understand how the gentleman from Pennsylvania can insinuate that it is a fraud upon the House; that was the resolution adopted by the House, and it has never been altered. It is carrying out the express order of the House.

Mr. CLYMER. Will my friend permit me? Yesterday when the question was put by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] as to the course of proceeding, he stated that the previous question was only to apply to the first section, and then it might be moved upon the other sections as they came up for consideration. Surely the proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] is to cut off all debate and bring us to a vote on the bill itself. I appeal to the gentleman having the bill in charge to say whether I am not right in this statement.

Mr. KENNA. One word further. I have no desire to shut off debate, except in so far as it may be necessary to cut off debate in order to pass the bill during this session. I want this bill passed.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an argument.

Mr. KENNA. I will confine myself to the question of order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to what the Chair said on yesterday, and which bears out the statement I made:

That is the argument under which the House is considering the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Now, that is the first intimation I can find on searching the RECORD that the bill was being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. It is not in accordance with the resolution which fixed the consideration of the bill, and I submit that a misapprehension of that kind on the part of the Chair cannot affect the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read what was said yesterday by the gentleman from Georgia, and will be found on page 25 of the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that when the previous question is ordered it should be understood that it shall operate upon each section of the bill separately, and that any amendments pending within the parliamentary law shall be acted upon under the previous question, and that each section shall be considered separately.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Clerk to read further on; on page 30, that which follows Mr. EWING'S speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. As the previous question has been demanded, I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it will cover the amendments which have been offered and printed, and whether those amendments will be considered as pending?

The SPEAKER. The effect of the demand for the previous question, if sustained, will be to bring the House to a vote on the first section and the two amendments, if there be two, pending thereto. This bill is being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and in submitting the demand for the previous question the Chair will state that it only operates on the first section of the bill and the amendments pending thereto.

Mr. KELLEY. There would be no hour for debate afterward?

The SPEAKER. The seconding of the previous question practically cuts off general debate, and would cut off the five-minute debate on the first section. But when the next section comes up the Chair would consider that until the previous question is called on that the five-minute rule would operate. There must be something upon which the previous question would operate, and this bill being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, in this instance it is upon the first section.

Mr. PRICE. Not upon the whole bill?

The SPEAKER. Not upon the whole bill.

Mr. CLYMER. Would the second section then be open to general debate?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it would only be open to the five-minute debate, for the reason that the House, by having seconded the demand for the previous question, has indicated practically a wish to go from the general debate on the bill to the five-minute debate on the remaining sections of the bill. The Chair thinks this is the common-sense and practical construction which should be given to the motion if sustained.

Mr. KENNA. I now ask to have read the original resolution fixing the time for the consideration of this bill, to show that the statement of the Speaker that the bill was being considered as in Committee of the Whole was a misapprehension of the facts.

The SPEAKER. Nobody contradicted it; but, on the contrary, everybody assented to it when the Chair made the statement as suggested from the floor.

Mr. CLYMER. It went unchallenged.

Mr. STEPHENS. Several days ago I suggested to the House that we should take the vote upon the bill in this way.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask the gentleman if the House took any action on his suggestion.

The SPEAKER. It was a suggestion which was acquiesced in by the House, and became an agreement under which the House has since proceeded, and has governed the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS. And was announced by the Speaker.

Mr. KENNA. I have never so understood it, and I have been in my seat all the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman certainly made no objection to the statement of the Chair yesterday.

Mr. KENNA. I am not aware that a suggestion to the Speaker by a member of the House can make or alter a rule or order of the House.

The SPEAKER. A suggestion acquiesced in (and the gentleman had better understand it in the future) as to the order of business on a bill is binding upon the Chair and the Chair thinks should be upon the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state that I made the inquiry yesterday for the reason that I had offered an amendment to one section of the bill, which if the construction which the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] now desires to have made is placed on the rule, would deprive me of an opportunity to obtain a vote on my amendment. I voted for sustaining the previous question in this case because of the decision of the Chair in relation to the order of business, and other gentlemen so voted. But if a different rule of construction is to be given it would deprive members of the opportunity to vote upon amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has had no understanding with the members of the committee different from that which has been given.

Mr. KENNA. Are there not several amendments pending besides the one referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER?]

The SPEAKER. There are nine amendments pending, and if the construction which the gentleman wants to put upon this matter shall prevail at least six of those amendments would be kept from submission to a vote in the House.

Mr. KENNA. I understand that they have been accepted by consent to be voted on.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that the original resolution providing for the order of considering this bill be now read.

Mr. WARNER. In giving consent to amendments that were proposed and requesting that consent be given to have them printed, I accepted the ruling of the Chair under the resolution by which or under which this bill has been brought before the House. I did not myself know or understand exactly what would be the effect of those amendments, but I acquiesced in the ruling of the Chair upon the resolution in relation to the order of business.

Mr. CLYMER. Certainly that was the understanding.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. What resolution?

Mr. CALKINS. The original resolution by which this bill was brought before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. There is no controversy about that.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that it be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk is in search of it, and it takes time. If the gentleman has it before him he will be kind enough to forward it to the Chair.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not have it before me.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I desire to remind the Chair that I offered an amendment to strike out all of this bill after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof other provisions. That amendment was introduced and pending before any demand was made for the previous question. I desire to have that amendment voted on at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. Any other construction than the one which the Chair places on this matter would prevent the consideration of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN.] The resolution under which the committee reported this bill will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill No. 564, and the amendments thereto, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, be made the special order for consideration in the House on Saturday next after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. CALKINS. One further inquiry. Has that resolution been modified or changed in any way by the action of the House?

The SPEAKER. There was a subsequent understanding reached at variance with that resolution, as the Chair maintains, which was, that this bill should be considered by sections and open to amendments.

Mr. CALKINS. That was contained, as I understand it, in the statement made yesterday, by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Georgia also states that he made a similar statement several days ago.

Mr. CALKINS. Was the House called upon to act upon that suggestion?

The SPEAKER. It was assented to, and that consent should guide the House and does guide the Chair.

Mr. CALKINS. But the question I ask the Chair is, was the House pro forma called upon to act upon that suggestion?

The SPEAKER. There was no objection made to the agreement, either by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in charge of this bill, or by any other gentleman on the floor.

Mr. CALKINS. The question I ask is, was the proposition stated to the House so that the House might act upon it?

The SPEAKER. Any one member could have objected to it.

Mr. CALKINS. But there could be no objection until the proposition was stated to the House by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes a distinction without any difference.

Mr. CALKINS. It may be a distinction without any difference in the opinion of the Chair, but I think it is exceedingly important that we should not establish any dangerous precedent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I raised the question yesterday as to whether I could have a vote on my amendment if the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The issue was there joined.

Mr. SPRINGER. I raised the question in order to settle whether I could have a vote on my amendment. Understanding that I could, I have voted to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Before the question was put yesterday, I desired to call the attention of the Chair to this matter as an incidental matter, and the Chair refused to hear me. I will read from the RECORD if I may be allowed to do so.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to speak to a point of order?

Mr. CONGER. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. After all that has been read and stated by the Chair, and another matter had intervened, I asked the Chair—

If the previous question runs on the first section, and a vote is taken upon it, then that section cannot be further amended.

The SPEAKER. This is a proposition to amend several sections; and if it was allowed to come in, the Chair is of opinion that what the gentleman offers could only be inserted after the sections indicated have been struck out.

Mr. CONGER. But after the previous question has operated upon the first section and that section has been adopted then this amendment could not come in.

That is the very matter upon which the Chair had given a partial statement when other business intervened.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will read on he will find that while the Chair expressed an opinion on the subject, he rendered no decision; for none was necessary, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] having objected to allowing the amendment to be offered.

Mr. WARNER. I think we should proceed under the rulings of the Chair. That is the understanding, I believe, of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. KENNA. I wish to inquire whether if the theory suggested should prevail it would cut off a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

Mr. CONGER. I have not finished my statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. I read further:

The SPEAKER. There is now a demand for the previous question, and until that is disposed of the Chair cannot admit any further amendment without the consent of the gentleman from Ohio by temporary withdrawal of his demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Would this amendment be in order if the demand for the previous question should be voted down?

The SPEAKER. General debate would then be in order.

Mr. CONGER. Would this amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, when that condition arises, will consider that point.

Now, sir, up to that time members of this House, myself among the number, were endeavoring to find out what the effect of sustaining the previous question would be, and were unable to do so. This morning, before the previous question was put, I desired to renew these inquiries that I might know for my own satisfaction and for the benefit of other gentlemen who had expressed a desire to be informed what the effect of the previous question would be. The very fact that now when the previous question has been ordered members all over the House disagree about its effect shows that there was no proposition understood by all. I certainly could not understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman voted against ordering the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; I voted against ordering the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair thinks the gentleman understood.

Mr. CONGER. I voted against the previous question because if it had failed it would have left the whole subject open; ordering the previous question left it to the construction of individuals or of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not responsible for the want of knowledge of members on the floor.

Mr. CONGER. But the Chair has stated that his proposition was accepted by the House. I have read from the RECORD to show that it was not accepted by the House.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois was not allowed to come in because the gentleman from Ohio, who had demanded the previous question, refused to allow it to come in. That is the sole ground upon which the Chair held the amendment was prevented from coming in at that time.

Mr. CONGER. I do not find that in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman has not read the proceedings carefully.

Mr. CONGER. I do now find the refusal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is glad the gentleman has found it, for it puts the Chair in a correct position.

Mr. KENNA. If this bill be considered now in the House as in Committee of the Whole, would that cut off the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER?] I understand not.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of that amendment?

Mr. BUCKNER. It is an amendment to the eighth section in regard to coin certificates.

Mr. CLYMER. But in the order of its presentation what is its number?

A MEMBER. No. 3.

Mr. CLYMER. Then it cannot come in under parliamentary law.

The SPEAKER. When the section is reached two amendments to it would be in order; also a substitute for the section and an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. KENNA. Does the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri come within that category?

Mr. WARNER. I hope the House will be permitted to proceed under the understanding which was agreed to yesterday.

Mr. CLYMER. Would it be in order to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's object can be reached by voting down the main question.

Mr. CLYMER. There has been so manifestly an error that there ought to be some means of correcting it.

Mr. FORT. I wish to say that I understood this question exactly as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] have stated it. It was a fair understanding; and I think that now the House ought to abide by it.

Mr. KENNA. If the effect of my inquiry is to delay action on the bill, I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is endeavoring to ascertain whether the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is in the third degree. If so, it cannot technically be offered until the vote has been taken on one of the two prior amendments. The Chair is now advised by the Clerk that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is the second amendment to section 8. It would therefore be in order in any event.

Mr. KENNA. That was my understanding, and that is why I pressed my inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the main question upon the first section of the bill.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first section of the bill will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3511. The gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, or unit; a quarter eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece; a three-dollar piece; a half eagle, or five-dollar piece; an eagle, or ten-dollar piece; and a double eagle, or twenty-dollar piece. And the standard weight of the gold dollar shall be 25.8 grains; of the quarter eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece, 64.5 grains; of the three-dollar piece, 77.4 grains; of the half eagle, or five-dollar piece, 129 grains; of the eagle, or ten-dollar piece, 258 grains; of the double eagle, or twenty-dollar piece, 516 grains."

Mr. FORT. I would like to have read the section of the statutes which it is proposed to amend.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate; but the Chair will ask consent.

Mr. FORT. Certainly there can be no objection to reading that section of the statutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not necessary to read it, because the section of the existing law as proposed to be amended is made a part of section 1.

Mr. MILLS. This is in the nature of argument, and not allowable while the previous question is operating.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is correct.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair stated yesterday that two amendments were pending to the first section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was misinformed; but, in any event, the condition of the question is not altered. The Chair thinks, however, that he said "If there be amendments," making his statement conditional. Is there objection to reading the statute mentioned?

Mr. WARNER and Mr. MILLS objected.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the adoption of the first section.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 94.

So the section was adopted.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Section 2 will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 3513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3513. The silver coins of the United States shall be a dollar, or unit; a half dollar, or fifty-cent piece; a quarter dollar, or twenty-five cent piece; a dime, or ten-cent piece. And the weight of the dollar shall be 412½ grains troy; the weight of the half dollar shall be twelve grams and one-half of a gram; the quarter dollar and the dime shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half dollar. And silver dollars in the Treasury of the United States, when reduced in weight by natural abrasion more than 1 per cent. below the standard weight prescribed by law, shall be recoined."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the pending amendment to this section moved by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 2, line 8, strike out "12½" and insert "60;" so it will read:
And the weight of the dollar shall be 480 grains troy.

Mr. KIMMEL. I wish to offer a few remarks in reference to this amendment. Mr. Speaker, it is known to the older members of the House that at the last session I made an argument in favor of heavier weight for the silver dollar. The result has demonstrated I was right then. Since that period the value of the silver dollar has constantly descended. At that time I objected to the right of the Government to make charge for coinage as a tax upon silver, because it was simply taxing the holder of the dollar in the interest of every man who did not hold it.

There was then that condition of things and it is now proposed to make it still worse. It is proposed to tax every man in the interest of him who holds bullion, that is, that you shall take fifteen cents out of the pocket of every man who owns a silver dollar and put them into the pocket of the man who owns the bullion. That is the plain English of it, and there is no escape from it. The silver coinage will it is supposed reach from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000, and it is proposed that the laboring element of this country shall pay into the pockets of the owners of the mines 17 per cent., or the enormous sum of $10,000,000. That is the plain issue, and there is no use of disguising it under a cloud of words. Thus stands the fact: $15 in the hundred to the Government, or $15 in the hundred to the owner of the silver, or $15 in the hundred in the pockets of the people.

Every man on this floor must answer that question to his constituents.

Further than that, every man who hoards a gold dollar has the advantage of the man who hoards a silver dollar. If the time shall arrive, as we have been told it will, that suspension of specie payments will again occur, every man who has hoarded a silver dollar will lose fifteen cents on it. In other words, when bread shall be five cents a loaf every man who has hoarded a silver dollar will get three loaves less for his wife and children than the man who has hoarded the gold dollar. That is the issue plain and distinct. The simple question is whether or not the laborer who by the sweat of his brow earns that dollar shall pay fifteen cents of it to the man who owns the bonanza. It cannot be disguised.

Mr. BUCKNER arose.

Mr. KIMMEL. I cannot yield. Five minutes is a short time in which to explain my amendment.

In the next place, I hold the coinage of the light-weight dollar operates disadvantageously upon every producer in the country, because it raises the cost of production without raising the price of the material in the foreign market. We are now laboring under difficulty in that regard, and statesmen and manufacturers of Great Britain thoroughly understand the advantage they possess over us by low prices, for they are now lowering their labor seven and a half per cent., and every advance in value in this country is just that much disadvantage to the producing interests of the land. To him who has studied the commerce of the world this one fact is patent, that the country which gets into the markets of western Europe the lowest-price grain finds the readiest custom.

If by increasing the cost of production we again lose the foreign market for American production, labor will be unemployed, and we will have a recurrence of the want, misery and degradation from which we are just escaping. The laborer should not be sacrificed to the debtor class. The debtors are few as compared with the laborers. At death the trouble of the debtor ceases; at birth the trouble of the child of toil begins. Let us take care not to renew the debtor class by offering temptations to wild speculations.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to oppose the amendment. I do not agree with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] that we should increase the silver dollar so that it would contain 460 grains. We have a national debt now of about $2,000,000,000 in round numbers.

Every dollar of that debt, by the contract under which the bonds were issued, is payable in silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver. We may discharge that contract without repudiation, without dishonor, and in strict accordance with its letter and its spirit, in silver dollars of that weight. That is in accordance with the contract; but that is not all. Notice has been served upon the bondholders, by a solemn concurrent resolution, known as the Matthews resolution, passed by the last Congress, to the effect that the bonds of the United States were payable in such silver dollars. We may discharge that whole debt, according to the contract, in silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains. And yet it is proposed by this amendment to tender a bonus to our creditors of 47½ grains to the dollar on all our debt more than we have contracted to pay. Will any gentleman say that the people of this country are bound in honor to give such a bonus to the creditors of the country? I do not believe it. It would be offering to the bondholders to-day, to the creditors of our people, 11½ per cent. more than is called for in the bonds, more than we contracted to pay. Under what obligation are we to our creditors that we should do this thing? Have we not kept faith with our creditors at all times? Are not the dollars we now owe, silver dollars of 412½ grains, worth twice as much as the paper dollars we received during the war? Have we not acceded already to one unjust demand of our creditors by passing the act of March 18, 1869, changing the contract from a currency to a coin basis?

Are we the servants of our creditors, that we should again accede to their demands and pay them 47½ grains on the dollar of standard silver more than we agreed to? I say not. No gentleman would discharge his private debts in that way. No gentleman who goes upon the stock boards in New York and buys grain to be delivered on a future day at a certain price would pay a different price from what he agreed to pay simply because the grain had fluctuated in the market one way or another. And no honest government that has agreed to pay its debts in a specific coin is required to change that obligation simply because the thing it agreed to pay in has depreciated in the market. Especially is this so when that depreciation is the sole result of unfriendly legislation, which could be removed and the coin restored to its former value by an act of remonetization.

Put the silver back where it was before it was stealthily, fraudulently, and criminally demonetized by the Congress of the United States, and then we will be willing to have the bondholders meet us for the purpose of determining whether we are discharging our contract or not. Let us go back to where we were. Let us pay our debts according to the contract, and if the creditors are not satisfied with that let them make the most of it. They had better stand by the letter of the law than deny the letter and go forth with a repudiated contract to end, they know not where.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment increasing the silver dollar to 460 grains will add 11½ per cent. to the burden of the national debt, or about $230,000,000. It will increase the ten billions of national, State, municipal, corporate, and individual indebtedness of the United States at least $1,150,000,000 to the people, who are obliged to pay. Will we, for the benefit of the creditor class, rob the debtors at such a ruinous rate?

The wicked creditor of the Scripture, in default of the payment of a hundred pence, only took his debtor by the throat, saying, "Pay me that thou owest!" But the creditors of the United States, having their hands upon the throats of the people, demand all we promised to pay and two hundred millions more. Will we pay it? I say no. I will never vote a dollar more than we have agreed to pay; than the sum nominated in the bond.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the district I have the honor to represent on this floor, a district second to none in the United States in the magnitude of its business and property interests, I desire to protest against the passage of the bill now before the House, which provides for the unlimited and free coinage of silver and the unlimited issue of certificates against silver bullion.

I believe, sir, and my constituents believe, that this bill means to-day the repudiation—pure and simple—of one-sixth part of all indebtedness, public and private; what the measure of repudiation in the future may prove to be, will be determined alone by the future value of silver bullion.

Are the interests of the people to be advanced by adding to the colossal wealth of the owners of silver mines or discriminating in favor of this class of property-owners? Will the dollar stamp of the United States upon eighty-four cents' worth of silver belonging to private individuals add to the wealth of the nation or to the private individual, the owner of the bullion? Has the late coinage of silver in excess of the amount which has been used as a circulating medium, now stored in the vaults of the Treasury, added to the prosperity of the country? Every one will answer no!

If this bill is to become law it is inevitable that the country will be drained sooner or later of its gold coin and bullion, and that silver will become the sole unit of value, and that instead of a double standard we shall have a single standard, and that of silver.

If this bill is to become a law the German government and all who have silver bullion, the world over, will pour it into our mints to receive for every eighty-four cents a legal-tender silver dollar; they will make by this simple process nearly 20 per cent., and our own people, who will be obliged to receive the coins as legal tenders, will be the losers.

Coinage by the Government is properly only an official attestation of the weight and fineness of the metal stamped or coined. A silver dollar thus attested to-day should contain 484.45 grains as the equivalent of a gold dollar. The present value of silver bullion, in London, is about fifty pence per ounce; until it is worth fifty-nine or sixty pence the Government should have the profit, if the fraud of stamping eighty-four cents as worth a hundred is to continue.

If this bill is to become the law of the land its title should be changed to read "An act for the relief of the owners of silver mines," and an appropriation made for the purpose of erecting elevators and warehouses for the storage of silver coin and bullion. If the owners of silver bullion can have their property carried by the Government as this bill proposes, and can have certificates of its deposit made a legal tender for all dues to the United States, including custom-house duties, why not clothe bonded-warehouse receipts and all other representatives of property with the same functions of money?

My constituents are not the owners of silver mines, but they are largely interested in cotton, wheat, corn, flour, iron, and copper. Why should not the Government receive all these and other products of the earth on storage, issue certificates, and make them also a legal tender? And if the supply of money should be still insufficient to satisfy the honorable gentleman from Ohio, receive also titles of real estate, issue money certificates, and so continue until every species of property becomes a part of the currency of the country? Then we can issue for general distribution, pledging whatever may remain of the faith and honor of the nation, the billion of greenbacks asked for by the reverend and distinguished gentleman who occupies a seat on this floor.

No, Mr. Speaker, renewed and continued prosperity cannot be secured in this manner.

The only safe way, in my opinion, is to stop the coinage of silver altogether, and to say to the leading commercial nations of the world, "We will not attempt to help you out of your troubles until you agree with us to use silver as a measure of value. We are ready to enter into such a mutual compact with you as will have the effect of restoring silver to its old steadiness of value, so that it may again be a measure of other values.

Let us not attempt to force the issue of silver beyond the amount which can be used as a circulating medium until European nations will join with us in making a silver currency equivalent in value to gold. Let us rather maintain the honor and good faith of the nation at home and abroad; retain and maintain a gold standard, the commercial standard of value throughout the world, and in my opinion the day is not far distant when the city of New York will be the clearing-house for the commercial exchanges of the world.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit several facts which I think are of very great importance to the American people. On the 15th August, 1865, the public debt of the United States of every description, exclusive of cash in the Treasury, amounted to $2,750,000,000. On the 1st of May, 1879, the public debt, including the bonds issued to the Pacific Railway Companies, exclusive of cash in the Treasury, amounted to $2,540,000,000 in round numbers. In fourteen years the debt has been reduced $209,789,000. Yet, with that reduction of the debt, the Government has collected from August 15, 1865, to May 1, 1879, $5,184,000,000. The expenditures during the same period were $5,226,000,000. At the rate at which the public debt has been reduced since August, 1865, it will take one hundred and thirty years to extinguish it. And at that rate of extinguishment it will take forty-eight billions of money to pay the public expenses and extinguish the debt, nearly twice the estimated value of all the property in the United States.

With these appalling facts before the American people, another fact presents itself, that you have now in round numbers two billions of interest-bearing debt. The next question that presents itself is, In what manner will this debt be discharged that we may be free from the enormous burdens that now and will hereafter press upon the American people? We first look to the terms of the debt. I find under the act of 1870, which bullionized this debt of the United States, that it is payable in coin at its then standard value, to wit, the standard coins of gold and silver. What, then, Mr. Speaker? Let me call the attention of the House to this fact. What is the meaning of the standard coin and the meaning of the contract? What interpretation will be put upon it one hundred years hence in the vicissitudes and changes of standards throughout the world? That you have promised to pay this, not in tale or by the denominational value, but you have promised to pay it in weight at the rate of 25.8 grains to the gold dollar; you have promised to pay it at the rate of 412½ grains of silver to the dollar; and it is a question of weight and not of denominational value. There it is. It is the question now of the mountains of your gold and silver against the mountains of your national debt, and you weigh the mountains of the one against the mountains of the other. And as long as that public debt exists let me assure you and the people of the United States that every revenue department of this Government will be deranged. It will produce discontent; it will produce oppression; it will produce bankruptcy; and it will require the expense of an Army to subjugate the American people, to make them submissive to unparalleled extortions and quiet under the load under which they swelter and stagger. I put it to any gentleman on either side of this House if he has promised to pay a debt in a particular coin of the weight of 412½ grains, if it were his own debt, before God would he pay it in coins of greater weight than in coins of 412½ grains? No; never. Then let each Representative do as well by the people as he would by himself.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is another effort to make money cheap, as it is called, by the simple process of legislating eighty-five cents' worth of silver into a dollar. It was done once before, when silver was higher in the market than now. When the Bland bill was passed it was contended that the remonetization of silver would raise the market value of this metal and we would gain by that speculation the difference in the value of the coin between what it was then and what it ought to have been. The bill passed, but instead of rising, silver went the other way. The fluctuation of values in the market, you see, is one of those things "no fellow can find out." [Laughter and applause.] And with this warning fresh before them the silver advocates, undaunted, ay, bolder than ever, now propose that we shall, under the deceptive cover of a bill establishing free coinage, allow anybody who owns eighty-five dollars' worth of silver to go to the nearest mint and obtain one hundred "standard" silver dollars for it.

If this bill intends to make everybody "better off" without taking anything from anybody it does not fill the bill. It does not make a dollar more easily earned, only cheaper in its composition as a coin. This "cheap dollar" does not bring a reduction of prices in other articles with it, but simply lowers itself in the scale of articles of exchange. It simply requires the Government to actually "coin" money in every sense of the word for the wealthy owner of silver mines or the speculator (who can buy silver in the London market at eighty cents) by stamping upon every eighty-five cents' worth of it the goddess of liberty upon one side and a thin-feathered spread eagle upon the other, and then enable the lucky owner of the metal to pay with such a "dollar," fictitiously valued at one hundred cents, their workmen, their laborers, their taxes and debts, and thus to deduct fifteen cents on every dollar's worth of merchandise or labor obtained, and to compel everybody to "trust in God" for this balance due.

If any necessity existed for increasing the amount of our "cheap" standard silver dollars now in circulation, if they were really demanded as an acceptable medium of exchange, the United States Treasury would not be compelled to hoard some twenty millions of them while 4 per cent. bonds and ten-dollar certificates and greenbacks worth, thanks to resumption, one hundred cents in gold, go off like hot cakes. But like chickens these "standard" dollars always come home to roost. Like poor relations they show a tendency to stick very close. Uncle Sam's cash-box at the other end of the Avenue is "chuck full" of them; they persistently refuse to move on although they are for sale. "Competition open to the world!" Nobody wants them or would even give his paper dollars in exchange for them, because, who cares to give one hundred cents, whether in gold, paper, or merchandise or labor for eighty-five cents' worth of silver even if dressed up like a real, genuine silver dollar of one hundred cents' value?

We cannot create values, while we can easily injure them. It is easier to destroy than to build up. We may legislate thirty-three inches to be a standard yard, but no merchant would be found willing to spread these thirty-three inches over the length of thirty-six inches, and thereby lose part of his merchandise without proper compensation. We may knock a leg from under a table, and it will be a "table" still, but who cares to pay the full value of the article for it in that condition? The finances of the country, like a virtuous woman's reputation, ought not to be tampered with. We cannot compel the great commercial world to lower the value of every merchantable article fifteen cents in order to bring them down to the level of our "standard" dollar; neither can we compel this great commercial world to accept as full for other values a dollar which we have reduced to the condition of the three-legged table. We can divide a unit into ten tenths but we can never change nine-tenths into a full unit. Neither can we legislate eighty-five cents into a dollar of one hundred cents.

With great profundity and display of knowledge, the advocates of the cheap dollar lecture us upon the necessity of a "bimetallic standard," a "double standard of values," and other scientific terms for what had always seemed to me a very simple thing. During the thirty years of business life that I have passed through I always found that if I owed anybody I was expected, as an honest man, to pay every cent of my indebtedness, whether upon a single or double "standard of values," and whether the circulating medium in which payment was made consisted in gold, silver, greenbacks, or commercial paper. And the only double standard which I tried to maintain was the equal value between my labor and the amount of money I had to earn, and if I found that they would not meet upon a common basis I had to double my efforts at work or run into debt. So it is with a nation. We cannot legislate eighty-five cents' worth of silver into a "dollar" and thereby raise the product of our labor. By cutting down the intrinsic value of the coin we simply place it lower down in the scale of values; that is all.

An acre of land, a bushel of wheat, a day's labor will not gain one cent in value by it. Of course we can raise or lower the "standard of values" either by increasing the intrinsic value of our metallic currency—which course, however, no one has as yet proposed—or by diminishing it, as has been done, fortunately to a degree not yet sufficient to affect our good name, in the case of the Bland dollar, and as it is proposed to do now on a larger scale by this so-called free-coinage bill. But whether we raise or lower that standard, which in reality is nothing but a means of comparison between different values, we would only accomplish the same disturbance, upon a general scale, as if we would change the present size of a yard-stick, the contents of a bushel, the weight of a pound, or the number required to make a dozen. The size, contents, or weight of merchandise would have to accommodate themselves to the changes decreed by us; that is all. But the market value of these articles will never be affected by such legislation. Merchandise and labor, real estate and farm products, the difference in values between consumption and production, will neither rise nor sink according to our mandates. There is but one law to which they bow in submission, a law which no Congress has enacted and which no Congress can ever repeal—the great commercial law of supply and demand.

It is claimed that the silver dollar when demonetized contained no greater amount of metal, and that it is fair and just to pay debts contracted when that amount of silver constituted a dollar of one hundred cents in a coin of the same intrinsic value now. At first sight this looks like a reasonable conclusion, and yet it is not an honest proposition. Had silver appreciated instead of depreciating in value no one would insist that we ought to pay now for every dollar received then in a coin containing one hundred and fifteen cents in silver; all that could be asked of us would be a payment of "dollar for dollar." And what is just in the one case must be just in the other. If it takes more silver to-day to make a dollar worth one hundred cents let us be honest about it and also pay "dollar for dollar." There can be no compromise about honesty. We cannot be half or three-fourths honest, or honest to the extent of eighty-five cents on the dollar, like a bankrupt. Whenever a man tells me that he can get rid of his debts more easily by paying in a "light-weight" silver dollar I always feel like giving him a bit of cheap advice. I would tell him that one of the best principles a man can follow in life is to do well whatever one does. If you want to be dishonest don't give your honesty away for a trifle. If you want to be rid of your debts don't quarrel with your creditor about fifteen cents; be manly and frank and tell him right up and down that you don't want to pay him and don't mean to. That's fair and square so far as it goes.

With touching piety this "dollar" has been styled the "dollar of the fathers." But there is no relationship between the two. This dollar is an altogether different one, and a fraud and a usurper if it takes the name of so honored an ancestor. The "dollar of the fathers" was an honest dollar, worth one hundred cents, inside and outside, and stood even at a premium in the market, because, unlike our "standard silver dollar," which promises more than it gives, it gave more than it promised. Silver then stood much higher in the scale of purchasable articles than now, and yet that dollar contained as much and, considering fineness, even more metallic value than its spurious modern relation. This "latter-day saint," if I may use the term in an inoffensive way, has only borrowed the gown of the true "dollar of the fathers," and one that is too large for it at that, because the honest owner enjoyed a more solid corporeity, so to speak; there was no deception about it, no padding, no sawdust, no prospective increase of future market-value about it; whoever paid a debt with it paid an honest dollar; whoever received it needed no market quotations to satisfy himself that he would lose nothing by taking it "in full for all demands." This honest "dollar of the fathers" was a dollar of one hundred cents, payable without rebate or discount. Its name, like the very name and honor of the fathers, should be preserved pure and unalloyed. But eighty-five cents' worth of silver will never constitute a dollar, though wearing its dress and palmed off for the genuine article.

No sane man would come here to propose a law reducing the price of everything which man has made an article of barter, whether it is the rich man's palace or the poor man's shanty; whether the solid farm or stock in the "Digdeep-and-Findnothing Mining Company;" whether "gilt-edged" commercial paper or a washerwoman's bill; whether silver in bullion or Yankee notions; whether doctor's fee or tailor's bill; whether newspaper advertising or undertaker's charges, because it requires no study of political economy or social science to understand that they will not be "legislated" worth a cent. But because that cannot be done, and because we cannot honestly refuse to pay our debts, it is seriously proposed to accomplish the reduction of values in general by reducing the value of the standard by which they are measured. Because the fox had lost his caudal appendage, his brethren were asked to voluntarily dispense with it also. I fear the fox in this case is also doomed to disappointment, like the one in the fable. But the latter was at least honest in one respect, he did not hide under an assumed dignity claiming undue veneration, while the disfigured, dishonest wretch of a dollar, whose value has been curtailed to the amount of fifteen cents, is donning the pure and honored garb of a noble ancestor—the "dollar of the fathers."

This ingenious process of scaling down the dollar to eighty-five cents' worth of silver is called making it "cheaper." Of course it is a cheaper dollar; too cheap, indeed, to be good. We are to go into the wholesale manufacture of these "light-weight" standard silver dollars, fondly expecting that silver may rise sufficiently in market value to make them ultimately worth one hundred cents, and thus we speculate in matters where our integrity is at stake. We are to fall down before this false prophet who comes here and exclaims, "Down with the simple rules of arithmetic! away with the foolish notion that honesty is the best policy! perish the thought that a nation must be honest as well as the individual! come all and worship me, for I am the great prophet who shall deliver you from the bloated bondholder and the burdensome debts which you thoughtlessly contracted; who shall make you all rich and happy by keeping fifteen cents out of every dollar you pay or receive! I am the genuine article, the long-lost, dearly-beloved 'dollar of the fathers!'"

I, for one, will not worship this false prophet. The "dollar of the fathers" was a democratic dollar, honest, capable, and democratic—honest in weight, capable of doing what was expected of a full dollar, and democratic in its conservative character; no "money of the future" about it; no compulsory offering of a "tithe" of fifteen cents was asked by this true prophet of honest money; you could trust in him for the full value of your money, and were not asked to "trust in God" for the difference between eighty-five and one hundred cents. It was a dollar of the people, for the people, and by the people—coined upon the principle that if the Government asked a full dollar in taxes or customs, it should also pay its officers, its soldiers, its laborers, and creditors with a full dollar, and that the Government could not do legally what was reprehensible and punishable in the individual—to clip a coin and thereby reduce its value.

Then the Government was not "on the make." But now it is proposed to let not only the Government make such "cheap" dollars for its own benefit, but for everybody who has or can buy or possibly steal enough silver in bullion to carry it to any United States mint and get his hundred "standard silver dollars" for it. Of course the poor laborer will hasten to avail himself of this privilege of "free coinage" and borrow a mule-team and wagon to haul his superfluous silver bars to the nearest mint and have them coined into available cash; or imagine a couple of thieves consolidating their stock of stolen plunder, melting the stolen silver spoons, sugar-bowls, plates, and cups into "bullion" and realizing on the latter 15 per cent. by exchange for standard silver dollars at the nearest mint!

This is the "cheap" dollar, the bogus "dollar of the fathers." One of the first things which experience teaches us in life is that the best is in the end always the cheapest, while on the other hand the cheapest article is never or hardly ever the best. So it is with money. That which gives most satisfaction is in the end the cheapest. And no money or coin can give satisfaction which requires study or care how to avoid a loss between the amount for which it has been received and the amount it will bring when it is paid out whether in merchandise or labor.

Our paper dollar rose from a commercial value of forty cents in gold at one time to one hundred cents in gold at the present time, not because the gold dollar has been made "cheaper" by some such hocus-pocus as that to which the silver dollar has been subjected, but because our credit and the faith of the commercial world in our integrity and readiness to pay if called upon, bade this paper dollar "to rise" in the market and induced the great commercial world to receive it as a substitute for the intrinsic value of the gold dollar. But this so-called standard silver dollar rests upon an altogether different basis from that of the paper dollar. With the latter we have pledged our good name and credit as a nation, which are as good as gold to the commercial world.

But when we thrust this cheap standard silver dollar upon the money market we pledged neither our credit nor good faith, nor did we promise to redeem it at some future day in a better coin. Nothing of the kind. We simply said: "We want a double standard of value. Give us the double standard; business will revive, the country will prosper under a double standard. Our fathers had a double standard. Money will become plenty and labor will find employment if we return to the double standard. We don't know exactly how all this will be accomplished, but it's all right. By all means let us have the double standard. The gold dollar, worth one hundred cents or their equivalent all over the world, we cannot change in its intrinsic value, for the simple reason that we haven't got it and we have no gold to coin dollars of lesser value; but we can try our hand in making cheap silver dollars. We have the silver, have the mints and the good-will to make money in every sense of the word. We will practice economy in everything, and begin by making ninety cents' worth of silver do for a dollar. It will be a good speculation besides, because by putting silver in circulation as money we create a demand for it and it will rise in the market."

But instead of witnessing a rise in the value of this metal that silver dollar to-day is only worth eighty-five cents in the market. The commercial world turned its back upon this offspring of our financial folly, and refused to have anything to do with it. The commercial world said to us: we accepted your gold dollar for one hundred cents because it has an intrinsic value to that amount, and we accepted your paper dollar for one hundred cents because it is your sacred promise to pay that much to redeem it when asked to do so; but your standard silver dollar has neither the intrinsic value of the gold dollar, nor is it like the paper dollar a promise to pay, except that we are asked to "Trust in God" and a probable rise in the market price of silver for what it lacks in real value. It pretends to be the equal of your gold dollar in intrinsic and your paper dollar in commercial value, without rendering an equivalent for the intrinsic value of the former, or securing the full commercial value of the latter by any promise to make up the amount of silver deducted in coining save by the cheerful exhortation to "Trust in God" for the balance.

So it came that this bright, shining silver dollar, of which it had been said that even children cried for it, instead of gladdening by its merry ring and silvery tongue the hearts of those to whom the vicissitudes of ceaseless travel through the channels of commerce might have carried it, is left to pine away behind the strong walls of the Treasury vaults and to ask wonderingly:

> Since I so soon am done for,
> I wonder what I was begun for?

And notwithstanding this sad fate of the Bland silver dollar, it is now seriously proposed to repeat that folly on a much larger scale, by allowing all owners of silver to become copartners of the Government in making such money, and pocketing the profit of fifteen cents on every one of these "poor man's dollars!"

I am willing to vote for a bill authorizing the free coinage of silver, provided the dollar coined under its provisions is a dollar in deed and not in name only. It must be a good, sound, democratic dollar of one hundred cents value—the true heir and descendant of the "dollar of the fathers." It must require no treatise on the modern science of money-making or a chromo to be given with every coin issued in order to conciliate the unsuspecting, horny-handed son of toil to the fact that he does not get the full value of his wages, his labor, or product. And if there should be a rise in the future market value of this metal—a consummation devoutly to be wished for, because it is one of the greatest American products—there will then be ample time to clip the wool of our silvery sheep a little. But until then we have no more right to force a "dollar" worth only eighty-five cents into circulation than a merchant has to give his customer but eighty-five cents' worth of merchandise for a full dollar, expecting that this merchandise will some day rise in the market. Our credit and good name for fair dealing must not be stretched like a rubber band, lest they might snap some day and contract themselves to most uncomfortable proportions. It is a simple matter of honesty—nothing else—and no statesmanship, no sophistry, no blending rhetoric can make it anything else.

It has also at all times been good democratic doctrine that honesty is always the best policy; the assertion that a dollar contained one hundred cents required no reaffirmation in any national or State platform to be accepted by all good democrats, and the honest "dollar of the fathers" will again be demanded by our party when this epidemic of financial statesmanship has run its course.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will not pass. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCKNER. I am very much surprised that my friend from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] should offer this proposition. I presume it is the "honest dollar" proposition. Let me say that the effect of this, if we were so blind to our own interest as to add fifty grains more to the silver dollar, would be that we should in the first place have two legal-tender dollars, one weighing 412½ grains and the other 460 grains. But that is not all. That is objection enough to it that it gives us two legal-tender dollars, one weighing 412½ and the other 460 grains. But, sir, it further proceeds upon a total misconception of the present cause of the decline of silver. This section, Mr. Speaker, is word for word a former act of Congress in reference to this matter of coinage passed prior to 1873, and then the silver dollar was worth more than gold.

Mr. KIMMEL. We admit all that.

Mr. BUCKNER. Now, my friend says he admits there is no sort of ground for this proposition unless silver has depreciated. If the government of this country has done it, if we have helped to do, if we have participated in this iniquity, I care not for what reason, that was the cause of the depreciation, and no man can deny it, then it is folly, madness, robbery, and iniquity to say that we shall furnish coin that is in the excess of value over the present coin and which would inevitably leave the country as merchandise. What is the matter with the silver dollar now? It is overvalued as compared with the European valuation, theirs being 15½ grains and ours 16 to 1, and to ask that all Europe, with its billions of silver, shall change its valuation is unreasonable, if not impossible of execution.

Now, if you put forty or fifty more grains in it you are depreciating one of your most valuable products and making it dog cheap, and you are saying to our friends in European countries who are for remonetizing silver and for bimetalism that we will not join with you, for fifteen and a half is the European standard; and to ask them to change their valuation to four hundred and sixty grains is expecting them to do that which is impossible.

Mr. ELAM. Will it not drive silver out of this country?

Mr. BUCKNER. Of course it will drive it out, and we will become the laughing-stock of the world in our attempt to depreciate our own great and valuable product of silver.

Mr. Speaker, this is said to be an honest dollar. Sir, it is a dishonest dollar. It is the dollar of the robber and the plunderer of the laborers of this country. That is what it is I undertake to say, and I challenge contradiction from any gentleman who favors adding to the weight of the present dollar, that eighty-five cents' worth of silver bullion will buy more of anything made or manufactured or raised in this country or in Europe than a gold dollar would buy in the last twenty-five years. Go into this city, and with eighty-five cents of silver bullion you can buy more houses and lots than a gold dollar would buy within the last twenty-five years. That shows that the value is relative when compared with gold, and there is no real depreciation of silver.

It is our action in connection with Germany that has depreciated silver measured by appreciated gold, and therefore as soon as we (and we ought to take the initiative) determine that we will stand by the standard ratio heretofore adopted, I believe that the nations of Europe will join us and by some international arrangement we shall come to some common ratio of value.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I deprecate this discussion, because I am satisfied that evil and not good will come from it. I want to call the attention of the House, and in doing so I may call the attention of the country to some of the—if it be not unparliamentary to say it—absurd statements made here in regard to the currency and finances of the country. I want to notice a remark made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] a few moments ago, the effect of which was to make the country believe that we have been retrograding financially instead of progressing.

He gave to the country and to the world the statement that since 1865—fourteen years—we have reduced the public debt about two hundred millions. As the basis of that he says that the public debt in 1865 was $2,750,000,000 and now it is about two billions five hundred and forty millions, showing a reduction of the public debt from 1865 to 1879 of only about two hundred and ten millions. Now, sir, the fact is that the public debt less cash in the Treasury in 1865 was, taking the gentleman's own figures, two billions seven hundred and fifty millions as stated, and to-day the public debt (and I have before me the statement made on the 30th day of April, only a few days ago) is two thousand and twenty-seven millions in round numbers, making a difference in the reduction of the public debt from 1865 to the present time of about $722,783,000; so that the figures from the Treasury Department make the reduction between seven and eight hundred millions, instead of $200,000,000 as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee. These are the facts and the figures.

The gentleman from Tennessee calculates the debt of the United States in 1865, less cash in the Treasury, and now he calculates the public debt with the cash in the Treasury, and in addition he adds now the bonds issued to the Pacific Railroads, which he did not include in the amount in 1865.

Now, let me notice a statement which was made by my colleague [Mr. WEAVER] when I was absent. I want to show that the whole tendency of this debate, by gentlemen who advocate this bill, is to create unrest, uneasiness, dissatisfaction, uncertainty in our monetary and commercial affairs. I am a silver-dollar man, and in favor of the silver dollar of 412½ grains. But this discussion does no good to the country or to the currency of the country.

My colleague stated the other day in substance—and if it be disputed I will quote his words, for I have his printed speech before me—that this administration was ruining the country because it was selling its bonds at 4 per cent. instead of 6 per cent., and he makes the declaration in so many words that a 4 per cent. bond with interest payable every three months is draining the money of the country faster than the 6 per cent. bonds, and that the man who buys 4 per cent. bonds and gets his interest every three months gets more interest than if he held a 6 per cent. bond, and consequently the Government was and is being injured and the bondholder benefited. This, Mr. Speaker, is the first instance of four being more than six.

Why, sir, he may compound that interest, and take it out at the start as bankers do their money when they discount notes, and it will not come within a thousand yards of it.

Mr. WEAVER Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PRICE. No, sir; you cannot interrupt me in a five-minute speech. You can take your own time and I will answer in your own time any speech you may make or question you may ask.

I refer to this because the whole tendency of such statements going to the country is calculated to unsettle the business of the country, to make the people uneasy and dissatisfied, and to do nobody any good. To-day a day's labor will buy more of anything that a man eats or wears than it ever would at any time in the last fifty years of the history of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Gold and silver were the measures of value in this country until the demonetization act. Until that act passed we had two units of value, a gold unit and a silver unit. The bondholders and gold men managed by that act to increase largely the value of all debts by demonetizing silver and making gold more valuable thereby. And now they propose to add still more to the debt of the country by increasing the quantity of metal in the silver dollar which we propose to remonetize and coin without limit, as gold is coined. As has been already said by gentlemen, all the bonds under the funding act are payable in gold or silver of the standard value at the date of the funding act—July, 1871; that is, 412½ grains of silver to the dollar, and 25.8 grains of gold to the dollar. Now, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] shall prevail, and silver be made a new measure of value according to the rate proposed by his amendment, it will add over $200,000,000 to the burdens of this country. It will add 11 per cent. to the value of the silver dollar, and that being the measure of value it will add 11 per cent. to every debt payable in silver dollars.

My friend says that if this bill shall pass without his amendment the silver bullionists will make ten to twelve million of dollars. Suppose that to be true, which it is not, I had rather they should make that amount by a legitimate act than by perpetrating and continuing the fraud of 1873 we should put $200,000,000 more of burdens on the tax-payers of the country, to say nothing of the immense addition that would be made to the private indebtedness of the country as well as corporate and State indebtedness.

I say, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. EWING] said yesterday, no one can be found now to father the demonetization act. I believe that act is now by common consent considered the grandest fraud which ever was perpetrated upon a suffering people in any country.

My friend from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] if his amendment prevails, will make the relative value of silver and gold 17¼ to 1. I will say to him that at no time and in no country do they bear that proportion. In France the proportion is 15½ to 1. By the policy of the French government gold and silver have been continued as currency at that rate.

Why cannot we follow the wise example of France? Why should we undertake to follow the course of Germany? France is flourishing and prosperous, while Germany is suffering.

My friend from Maryland also says that this is no party question. No, it is no party question. It is a question between the bondholder and capitalist on the one side, and the laboring masses and the country on the other. It is a question in which every man who labors has an interest. My friend says that if this bill shall pass the laboring-man may suffer. How will he suffer? He will regulate the price of his labor always by the currency in use at the time he makes the contract, and therefore he cannot suffer. But who will suffer? Why, the men and the States and the corporations that have debts to pay. And who will make by it? Those who have already made millions by bad and vicious legislation. Those who by the frauds of the act demonetizing silver made hundreds and hundreds of millions will make hundreds of millions more if this amendment becomes a law. They are the only class that will be benefited by it, and the tax-payers, debtors, and laborers of the country will suffer by it.

Mr. MONROE obtained the floor.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to give notice that after my colleague [Mr. MONROE] is through I will call the previous question on this section.

Mr. MONROE. I introduced into this House two or three weeks ago a proposition, upon which I asked for the yeas and nays, to the effect that, in the judgment of this House, the business interests of the country required that we should not enter upon any financial legislation at the present session of Congress. I offered that resolution in good faith, because it was the expression of my own convictions; and the convictions which I hold in regard to financial legislation generally at the present session I hold with special earnestness in regard to legislation on the silver question. I cannot vote for this bill, nor can I vote for any amended form of it that makes important changes in existing laws. In my judgment the Congress of the United States never was more unfavorably situated to legislate upon the question of the silver dollar than it is at this session. Why do I hold that opinion? Because the Old World, and especially England, is experiencing at this moment a revolution of opinion upon this whole subject of the double standard; a revolution which also affects France and the continent of Europe. There is good reason for believing that within the next year or two years all the elements of our knowledge and all the conditions for legislation upon this subject will have changed.

Now, how unfortunate it is for us to seize this moment, when public opinion abroad in the great commercial and civilized States is passing through a grave and fundamental transition, to undertake to legislate here to make coinage free or to change the number of grains in the silver dollar.

The Chamber of Commerce of the city of Liverpool the other day unanimously adopted an expression of opinion in favor of the double standard, and sent a deputation of their best men to London to lay their opinions before the ministry. These opinions were received favorably, and the Earl of Beaconsfield on two occasions has expressed himself as at least strongly inclined to the restoration in England of the double standard. Discussions like those in Liverpool have also sprung up in Manchester, Birmingham, and London, making it apparent that England's relations to India, China, and South America, pressed upon her attention by the arguments of her manufacturers and her merchants, will lead to the remonetization of silver throughout her empire.

Our own Cabinet here in Washington, within the past week, has had at least one meeting which was devoted to the discussion of this question and the reopening of diplomatic correspondence with England and France in reference to the restoration of the double standard and the fixing of the ratio between gold and silver. It is plain, then, to me that it is much better for us to await the result of these negotiations, to await the result of the revolution of opinion which is taking place in England and on the Continent, before we attempt to cast our legislation into that fixed and permanent form which the country needs upon such a subject. No one in this House can even guess to-day what will be the conditions of legislation for this great question twelve months hence. Why, sir, one of my friends wishes to-day to fix the dollar at 460 grains. Nobody can give this House any reason why 460 grains should be named. Why not 470 grains? Why not 450 grains? Why, sir, the bullion value of silver to-day would demand 487 or 488 grains. The gentleman has fixed the figure far too low so far as the bullion value of silver is concerned, and, in my judgment, very much too high in view of the events which are fast transpiring in England and other foreign countries.

My own judgment is that within a year or two there will be such an understanding reached between England, France, and the United States as will fix our silver dollar as low as 412½ grains, and will probably establish the French ratio of 15½ to 1 as the permanent ratio for the civilized world. But, however this may be, it is evident that this is not a favorable time to undertake a revision of our legislation upon the silver coinage. Let the law remain as it is for the present, and let the country have rest.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment. This is not the first time that attempts have been made in the Congress of the United States to compel the laboring millions to contribute the proceeds of their toil and sweat to increase the wealth of the favored few, in violation of binding contracts and under the wicked pretense of giving to all an honest dollar. I remember that the people of this country rested for seven years in the consciousness of owing $1,500,000,000 in 5-20 bonds, payable in greenbacks. This was the contract, but in 1869 the Congress of the United States passed an act making these same bonds payable in coin. And when they did that they broke a solemn contract. I will not say what the intention was, but I do say that the result was millions of dollars wrung from the suffering and sweat of the common people and given to the bondholders. Then silver was demonetized and the double standard of our fathers struck by down stealth, and so silver has been twice humiliated; once by Judas Iscariot, who sold his God for thirty pieces, and once by a republican Congress. Thus the work has gone on—the work of ruin and reckless discrimination in favor of a bonded aristocracy.

Why is it that we have a democratic majority in both Houses of Congress to-day? If a party rules justly and with an even hand why take from it the power and give it to another? Why is it? It is because a confiding people have been betrayed by leaders who have held the sway for fourteen years; it is because right has been trampled under foot; it is because the most binding contracts have been repudiated and the dearest interests of the people disregarded; it is because by demonetization and contraction and taxation the great mass of the laboring and business men of the nation have been ruined. And now, I say to the democracy, you have the power, use it; the eyes of the people are upon you. Do not use it as the republicans have, in the interest of capital and against labor. If you do, take warning; the people will turn their backs on you forever; and they ought to do it.

The passage of this bill as reported by the committee will be a grand step in the right direction, because the free coinage of silver with 412½ grains to the dollar is the will and wish of the people and because it is just and honest, the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland to the contrary notwithstanding. I have no doubt the intention of the gentleman himself is good, but the effect of his amendment providing for 460 grains of silver to the dollar would be to compel the debtor class to pay to the creditor class 47½ grains in the dollar more than is due; the terms and conditions of all former contracts would be changed; the gold worshipers would gain another great victory, silver would be again humiliated, and the people, now overburdened with debt and taxation, would be robbed again of millions more.

Mr. Speaker, there is no danger of silver becoming too plentiful as long as we have four millions of laboring men and women among us without employment and without bread. Let us pass the bill, and the voice of the people will be, "Well done, ye good and faithful servants."

Mr. WARNER. I call for the previous question on the second section and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded, there being—ayes 101, noes 85.

The main question was then ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8 of section 2 strike out the words "twelve and a half" and insert the word "sixty;" so as to read:

"And the weight of the dollar shall be 460 grains troy."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were ayes 70, noes not counted.

Mr. EWING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 52, nays 176, not voting 57; as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 3520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3520. Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint to be formed into bars, or into standard dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, for his benefit, and no deposit of silver for other coinage shall be received; and silver bullion contained in gold deposits, and separated therefrom, may be paid for in silver coin: Provided, That it shall be lawful to refuse at the mint any deposit of less value than $100 and any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint."

The SPEAKER. There are two amendments pending to that section reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which will be read.

Mr. MILLS. I also have an amendment pending to that section.

The SPEAKER. There are two amendments to that section recommended by the committee, and the Chair presumes that the gentleman in charge of the bill proposes to allow other amendments to be offered after the disposition of the committee's amendments.

Mr. WARNER. Let the amendments be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first amendment proposed by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, strike out the word "silver," making it read:
To be formed into bars or standard dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is merely verbal.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment offered by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11, after the word "of," insert the words "bullion of;" making it read: "It shall be lawful to refuse at the Mint any deposits of bullion of less value than $100," &c.

Mr. WARNER. That also is merely verbal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the amendments offered by gentlemen in the order in which they were submitted.

The Clerk read the following amendment, offered by Mr. KIMMEL:

Section 3, lines 6 and 7, strike out "12½" and insert "60;" so it will read "dollars of the weight of 460 grains troy."

Mr. KIMMEL. I withdraw that amendment.

The question then recurred on the following amendment, moved by Mr. BELFORD:

After the word "bullion," in line 4, section 3, insert the following words: "produced from the mines of the United States;" so it will read: "any owner of silver bullion produced from the mines of the United States may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into bars or into standard dollars," &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. Home industries!

Mr. WARNER. Home industries will not suffer under this bill as it is.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 105.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 105, nays 130, not voting 50; as follows:

The next question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. CALKINS; which was read as follows:

Add to the third section the following:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion may purchase silver bullion for coinage at its market value, and all gains and profits arising therefrom shall inure to the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use any surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to say a word upon the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. This amendment places in the coffers of the United States about 17 per cent. of all the silver bullion which would otherwise under this bill go into the pockets of the holders of the bullion. It seems to me that that clear and bare statement of the question should carry conviction to every person's mind that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. WARNER. The operation of the amendment would be to close all the mints against silver.

Mr. BROWNE. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that he is in favor of this amendment?

Mr. WARNER. I said that it would shut the mints against silver.

Mr. BROWNE. You have not answered my question.

Mr. WARNER. No, sir; I am not in favor of it.

The question was taken upon Mr. CALKINS'S amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 94, noes 104.

Mr. CALKINS, Mr. CONGER, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 115, not voting, 56; as follows:

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 16, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, a copy of his proclamation of the 26th of April, 1879, and copies of the correspondence and papers on file and of record in the Department of the Interior and the War Department, in reference to the alleged occupation of a portion of the Indian Territory by white settlers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to this message, it being in answer to a resolution moved by him.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the message and accompanying papers lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair also lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to the signing of land-patents by one of the clerks in his office to be designated by the President for that purpose.

This communication will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the communication had better lie on the table for the present. The subject-matter of it, I think, is now pending in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BECK. I was about to make that suggestion. An amendment on that subject was offered by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] and it will come up in the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table for the present. The Chair will also lay before the Senate a bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) authorizing the appointment of a commission to lease a building for a city post-office in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the bill read at length. Let us know what it is. I see it amends an act so very recent that I should like to know what it is.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That such parts of the moneys heretofore appropriated by the act of which this is amendatory for the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, in West Virginia, and the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky, as may be necessary in the prosecution of said improvements as undertaken may be expended in the purchase, voluntary or by condemnation, as the case may be, of such sites as are necessary in the prosecution of said improvements: Provided, That such expenditure shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That if the owners of such lands or sites shall refuse to sell the same at reasonable prices, then the prices to be paid shall be determined and the title and jurisdiction procured in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State in which such lands or sites are situated.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, in the absence of my colleague, [Mr. HEREFORD,] who would have immediate charge of the bill, he living in that section of the State and being also a member of the Committee on Commerce, I wish to say that it is important that the bill should be acted upon early, and I ask the Committee on Commerce at an early day to act upon it. I of course desire it to be referred, as bills are usually referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I also desire to implore the Committee on Commerce to examine with some care the question as to whether the provision for condemning property, as it is called, is one that will stand fire in the form in which it is now stated in this House bill. If they really want to condemn any land, it would be well enough to have the law of the United States so framed that it can be done and not prove a mere fiasco, as I am a little afraid it would as it reads now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of John H. Brooks, pastor, and others, members of the Fifth Baptist church, colored, of Washington City, praying that the Select Committee on the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company request that company to furnish the Senate a full statement of the amount of the indebtedness to that church; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (S. No. 605) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment; which was read twice by its title, and recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAXEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 606) to authorize the purchase by the Secretary of War of sites for forts and posts in Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. A friend handed me a bill this morning, which I have not had time to examine, relating to the purchase of a site for a city post-office here. By request I introduce it, and ask its reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 607) authorizing the Postmaster-General to purchase a site for a city post-office in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 608) for the relief of Drury Bynum; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 609) granting a pension to James E. Hargrove; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That the petition of C. J. E. Thompson be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Patents.

THE COIN RESERVE.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amount of the legal-tender notes of the United States have been presented and redeemed in coin since January 1, 1879; and also what amount of coin he considers himself authorized to retain in the Treasury for the purpose of maintaining resumption of specie payments under the provisions of the act of January 14, 1875.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. Let it be read.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask to have the amendment which I offer read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add after the words "seventy-six," in line 1705, the following proviso:

Provided, That the claims for arrears of pensions shall be settled and determined as rapidly as possible and as fast as determined, and as often as once in thirty days the Secretary of the Interior shall make requisition upon the Secretary of the Treasury for funds necessary to pay all claims then settled; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to promptly meet such requisitions by placing to the credit of the Commissioner of Pensions the amount of the same out of any money which may be in the Treasury not necessary to meet payments of interest on the public debt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

Mr. HARRIS. If there be no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 108, during the remainder of the morning hour.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill?

Mr. HARRIS. It is the bill reported back from the Select Committee on Epidemic Diseases, perhaps better known as the quarantine bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to proceed to the consideration of the bill familiarly known as the contagious diseases bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope we shall go on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senate will proceed now with the unfinished business, being the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion made by the Senator from Tennessee is in order, and the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not propose to antagonize the Committee on Appropriations. I supposed I had the acquiescence of the Committee on Appropriations to take up this bill during the morning hour. If I have not, I shall not undertake to antagonize that committee or to enter upon any struggle for the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that a morning or two ago I thought that the bill which the Senator from Tennessee seeks to bring before the Senate could be taken up in the morning hour, but so many Senators have offered amendments to the appropriation bill and are anxious to have them disposed of, that I fear to take this bill up would interfere with the consideration of the appropriation bill. As I am pressed all around to have the appropriation bill immediately considered, in order that we may get through with it and all the amendments proposed at the earliest possible time, I must insist on going on with the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee insist on his motion?

Mr. HARRIS. After hearing the statement of the Senator who has the appropriation bill in charge, I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no other motion to proceed to the consideration of business, the Chair will declare the morning hour at an end, and the unfinished business is the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move the amendment which I offered some days since in line 396 of the bill. I should like to have the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge to this amendment.

Mr. BECK. There is an amendment now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On line 58, page 3, after the word "pensions," it is proposed to insert "clerk to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads," so as to make the clause read:

> For clerk to the Committee on Finance, clerk to the Committee on Claims, clerk to the Committee on Commerce, clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, clerk to the Committee on Private Land Claims, clerk to the Committee on Pensions, clerk to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, at $2,220 each.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated yesterday morning all that I care to state in support of the amendment which comes from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. What I said yesterday appears this morning in the RECORD; and the statement made by the former chairman of that committee, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] also appears. Those statements to my mind are so clear that I think there will be no doubt in the mind of the Senate, and unless somebody has something to say about the amendment I will ask for a vote upon it now.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I expressed my opposition to this character of legislation some days ago in the Senate. I am opposed to the proposition to make permanent clerks to committees. This amendment is reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, of which I am a member; and that I may not be put in a false position as far as my individual views are concerned, I propose to say that I am opposed to all such amendments. At the same time I say here what I said in committee, and what I think, that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is as much, if not more, entitled to a permanent clerk than any of the committees named in the amendment of the Appropriation Committee; and I repeat that if the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, then I believe the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads ought also to prevail. Yet it is proper for me to say that I believe both amendments ought to be voted down.

Mr. President, listening yesterday to the gentleman who has charge of the pending appropriation bill, [Mr. BECK,] I was reminded very strongly of the great necessity that in my opinion devolves upon that gentleman and upon the Committee on Appropriations that they shall take some steps with a view to remedy the outrages of which the Senator from Kentucky spoke in his remarks yesterday morning. He enumerated a large number of custom-houses where the customs received do not begin to pay the expenses of their collection, and yet in another branch of his remarks he said he did not think probably that the Secretary of the Treasury could remedy that evil. I do not believe it. I believe those abuses are growing up and will amplify and multiply. Unless the legislation of the country is such as it ought to be, in view of the necessities of the people of the country, in reducing the expenses of the Government, it seems to me that we shall be placed in a very awkward position very soon. The idea is absurd that thirty-six of the custom-houses in the United States should cost many thousands of dollars more than the amount of the revenue collected at them. The Treasury Department certainly has largely the control of that subject; and if it has not, it seems to me that it is the duty of the committee to provide by law, so that the evil can be remedied and so that it shall be remedied.

I do not propose to make a party question of this or anything else, unless it is forced upon me; but certainly the party recently in power is responsible for these abuses and for this vast expenditure and waste of money, and the democratic party now being in power assumes the responsibility of remedying abuses. I appeal to the gentlemen upon the Committee on Appropriations, who seem to have charge of this subject, to inaugurate a system by which we shall curtail these expenses and prevent these abuses. I know that we are now assembled in extra session, when it cannot, perhaps, well be done, but a reform might be inaugurated through the agency of proper committees. I do not expect to accomplish more than the beginning of it at this session, but a great reform like that, it seems to me, ought to be inaugurated and prosecuted until we accomplish the result desired. Certainly we can save a great deal of these unnecessary expenses. Certainly we can prevent the waste of which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] spoke yesterday of thousands and thousands of dollars that have been appropriated and never have been accounted for. Whose fault is that? There is a fault somewhere, there is an error somewhere, there is a great wrong and an outrage upon the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. President, I do not propose to go into this question now. I will do it at some time but not to-day. I have been led into these remarks in relation to these expenditures by what was said by the Senator from Kentucky yesterday, and I do appeal to him now to see to it that the Committee on Appropriations shall inaugurate some system by which we can remedy these evils.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I take it for granted that the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be concurred in. That is a proposition adding the clerkships of the Committees on Private Land Claims, Pensions, and Military Affairs to the permanent clerkships of the Senate. We have now permanent clerks for the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Finance, the Committee on Claims, the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Committee on Printing. I desire to say that if any committee of the Senate, save perhaps the Judiciary Committee, is entitled to a permanent clerk, it is the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOUSTON. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. FERRY. There are more nominations, more controversies, before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads than before any other committee of this body. It is simply necessary to state the fact for it to be appreciated by every Senator here. The appointments of postmasters are numerous, and these appointments are perhaps the most difficult to get along with, because the questions involved are brought nearer to the people and the postmasters have more direct and daily contact with the people than any other officers. In fact the friction between the people who have interests with the post-offices and the postmasters is hourly and daily; and there is more interest felt, more criticism, more controversy on the nominations of postmasters than on any other nominations that have come within my knowledge and experience. Therefore I think if any committee clerk is entitled to the salary proposed here it is certainly the clerk of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It requires not only a man competent to do the clerical work, but he must possess more ability than is required to discharge the ordinary duties of a committee clerk. He must possess some judicial qualities; he has access necessarily to the Post-Office Department; he is sent to the Department by the different Senators composing the committee to investigate the various cases that are brought before the committee; and so numerous are these cases that it is impossible for the Senators themselves to give all the attention to them that is necessary, so that much of the work and labor of the committee devolves upon the clerk, and for that reason it is necessary that we should have a competent clerk. I have been conscious of this want of a permanent clerk for some time; but I hesitated in presenting the subject to the Senate. My successor has done so; and I am very glad that he has called the attention of the Senate to the subject; and I hope if the other committees named are to have permanent clerks this committee will also have one.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I was placed by the Senate as chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, having been at the time a member of that committee for four years. I determined, as far as I had the power to do it, to make that committee efficient. In order to do efficient work an efficient clerk is a necessity; and I will say to those gentlemen on the democratic side who justly favor economy that any good business man knows that in order to do good, efficient work you must have good, efficient men to do that work. The clerk of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as was so well stated by my predecessor in the chairmanship of that committee, [Mr. FERRY,] must have the capacity when a change in the law is proposed to know what the law is and what the defect complained of is, in short must know the law controlling the Post-Office Department. The committee should have before them an abstract of the old statutes, together with the facts which it may be claimed render a change necessary. A brief of the law pertinent and the facts in the examination of a case before the committee is of great service. It is perfectly well known that you cannot get a competent man to act as clerk of such a committee on a per diem pay, when one of the sessions of the Senate is but three months ordinarily, and the other covers a period of about seven months, for when he goes upon the committee he must give up all other work; and no man capable of being a clerk of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads can afford to give up his ordinary avocation and get pay for only three months during one year and six or seven months during the other year. An efficient clerk is of the greatest service to an efficient committee.

I beg to call the attention of the Senate to another point. If the members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads had no other work to do than that which comes to them as members of that committee they might very well get along with a per diem clerk. It is a work necessarily demanding practical business men; and I will say for that committee that it is composed of practical business men, who have to deal with the people of this country more than any other committee of this body. Their duties extend into every portion of the United States as well as across the water. The chairman of this committee is also a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, a hard-worked committee, and he has his duties to perform on the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads as well as on the Committee on Military Affairs. He is also a member of the Committee on Education and Labor. My colleague on the Post-Office Committee [Mr. SAULSBURY] is chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, a committee having great work to do, and he is on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] is chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, is on the sub-committee on Alleged Frauds in the Late Elections, is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and is also a member of the committee on the removal of the Northern Cheyennes. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] is on the Committee on Claims and on the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] is on the Committee on Pensions, the Committee on Mines and Mining, and the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] is on the Committee on Finance, a very important and hard-worked committee. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] is on the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Claims. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is on the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and the select committee in reference to claims against Nicaragua. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is on the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Alleged Frauds in the Late Elections, the select committee on the removal of the Northern Cheyennes, and the select committee in reference to claims against Nicaragua.

Now, take the list which I have just read and see the work which the members of the Post-Office Committee have to do outside of the Post-Office Committee; and to say that they can faithfully and efficiently discharge their duty here without having a competent clerk to aid them is to my mind a proposition that cannot be sustained.

If we expect to run this Government economically we must start the business right, for I say to the Senate that in my judgment this country has suffered more from crude, ill-digested legislation than from any other one cause. The Government of the United States and the tax-payers of this country would make money by having competent and efficient men everywhere connected with the Senate and House of Representatives. If good work comes up right from the committees, as it ought to come up from them, it will come up in the Senate intelligently and the Senate can act upon it intelligently.

Take the Committee on Appropriations. That committee has no more work to do, in my judgment, than the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. They have none but the appropriation bills referred to them; they have no nominations referred to them; they have no reports to make; yet they have a permanent clerk and a deputy clerk. Nobody objects to it, because I say that it is wise to have efficient force, but I do say for that committee that having their own nest so remarkably well feathered they ought at least to pay some attention to the wants of a committee having so much to do with the immediate business of the people of the United States as the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. This recommendation for a permanent clerk comes from that committee, and I say in all deference to the Committee on Appropriations that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads knows about as well what they need as any outside committee can know. I believe the amendment offered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is right, that it ought to be adopted; and I trust it will be adopted.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, one word. I do not know why it is necessary to refer to the action of the Committee on Appropriations as feathering their own nest. I do not think any of us are feathering our nest specially by retaining and maintaining the law as it stands, or by retaining competent persons to do our work; nor do we desire that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads should be prevented from having whatever aid is necessary to enable them to do their work properly and well, but this is the state of fact: we have, as I said yesterday, determined not to change the existing relations of the clerks at this extra session except where it had been heretofore agreed on between the two Houses, either by law or in conference. The Senate appointed, by a resolution of the 26th day of March, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate "to take into consideration, with the view to economy and the equalization of salaries upon the principles of justice, the question of the duties, number, and compensation of the employés of the Senate, and to report thereon by bill or otherwise; said committee to have leave to sit during the recess."

That committee assure us they are at work, endeavoring to ascertain what it is proper for them to recommend in that regard, embracing all the employés of the Senate, clerks and others. Until a report is made by them, the Committee on Appropriations did not feel authorized to select certain committees and ask to have assigned to them permanent clerks and leave other committees of equal importance without permanent clerks. Hence the committee did not engage in that business at all. The committee did not add now for the first time a permanent clerk to the Committee on Private Land Claims or to the Committee on Pensions. These are permanent clerkships now under the law for the current fiscal year and for previous years; and it was because the House saw fit to leave them out in making up this bill thus reducing the clerks of the Senate committees, and finding that those clerks were permanent now and not desiring to change the law in regard to them, we simply restored them. The Senate, by a vote at the last session of Congress, on motion of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] instructed us to add a permanent clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs. Being so instructed by the yea-and-nay vote of the Senate, we retained it in this bill. That is all the Committee on Appropriations did.

Now, it is insisted that the Committee on Private Land Claims is a very small committee, and yet we have given it a permanent clerk. I do not know why it was originally done; it was done before I came to the Senate. But I understand that when republican gentlemen saw fit to give to the democrats one committee and make a democrat chairman of it they gave him a permanent clerk, so that the democrats could have a committee-room of their own and a clerk of their own where they could hold their consultations. I have understood that it was given on that ground and on that ground alone; and when the democratic party came into power in this body they appointed a republican chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims and allowed him to have a permanent clerk, so that the republican minority could have a committee-room of their own and a clerk of their own, where they could hold their consultations. The Committee on Appropriations finding that was the law and that the law was passed for that purpose did not feel that they would be doing a very gracious thing, if as it was intimated by the Senator from Michigan they ought to have done, in striking off the clerk of that committee because he was not as hard-worked as some others are.

Mr. FERRY. I made no criticism on that; I was merely naming committees that had permanent clerks. In fact I supported that; and I think as it was fair in regard to the democracy it is equally fair in regard to the republicans. The democratic party have only done their part and just followed the example that was set them by the republican party. I have made no criticism as regards that. The only one I named with emphasis was the Committee on the Judiciary, that was doing perhaps more labor than any other committee, and second to that was the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; but I made no criticism as to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BECK. As I said, in view of the resolution that was passed by the Senate, in view of the information we are to get by the next regular meeting of Congress, the Committee on Appropriations determined to make no changes, and have made none, the only addition to the existing law or agreement being, as I have said, the Committee on Military Affairs, because of a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate ordering us to do it. We obeyed that command given at the last session of Congress on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

Now it is asked to make the clerk of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads a permanent clerk. I have no doubt that committee ought to have a competent clerk; I have no doubt that it is a committee of very great importance. If it is proper to go into a revision of all the committee clerkships, it may be entitled to more than it has; but now how does the matter stand? There are twenty-six committees of this House that now have per-diem clerks; there are eight that have permanent clerks. The pay of the permanent clerks is $2,220 a year; the average pay of the per-diem clerks is about $1,100. It varies, of course, depending upon the length of the long session, and compensation is generally given for thirty days or sixty days after the session closes. So that the cost of the permanent clerk being $2,220 and the cost of the per diem clerk being about $1,100, and there being twenty-six committees now that have per-diem clerks, if we increase this one we shall have to increase the Committee on Naval Affairs and a great many others of the committees, because they can all properly insist that they ought to have competent men to do their clerical work, and the increase of this bill by this change sought now to be made simply means to add $28,000 to the annual expenses of the Senate, and that is sought to be done in the face of an investigation now going on by a committee appointed by the Senate to look into the whole question and to see what it is proper to do.

It is for that reason that the Committee on Appropriations did not feel that they were authorized either to add any more permanent clerks or to change the per diem clerks to permanent clerks or to give their assent to any individual case unless the Senate should determine by an instruction (which we should regard this of course) that they are going to change from per diem to permanent clerks, and then I do not see how we can resist the application of any respectable committee for a permanent clerk.

I know that there are very many important matters to be considered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads which make it a very important committee. All the gentlemen on it are doubtless on other committees. So it is with other committees. I could state what other committees the different members of the Committee on Appropriations are on, and doubtless the members of each committee could do the same. But there is one thing that I would suggest and have suggested for a year or more, that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is, in my opinion, doing a great deal of very useless and very needless work. They are making up a long bill of one hundred or two hundred pages, and receiving one of a hundred or two hundred pages from the House, establishing post-routes all over the country, from Raccoon Fork to Confederate Cross Roads and everywhere else, though the committee do not know that the places even exist, and page after page of that sort of useless detail is brought before the Senate annually. Anything that any Senator offers goes to the clerk and is put on the bill. In the House they do not even take the pains to present the papers to the House; they take them to the committee clerk and they are added on.

In this way there is brought to us an apparently immense work, which keeps a clerk writing a month or two to make it up. Now, as every river in the United States is a post-route, and as every railroad in the United States is a post-route, all the committee, in my opinion, have to do is to introduce a bill in three lines saying that all the present public highways of the United States shall be and are declared to be post-routes, and the Postmaster-General is authorized to furnish such postal facilities thereon as the good of the service requires. That would end nine-tenths of their big work. It is nonsense to be doing it in any other way. Why should it not be so done if there is any great difficulty about making roads not yet established, that may become highways in the future, post-roads? Surely the present established highways in the United States can as well be made post-roads by a law of a single line as the rivers and railways and other highways are so made, and thus save all the nonsense we are year by year enacting.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he is a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads?

Mr. BECK. The gentleman ought to be familiar with the committees of the Senate. He knows I never was on that committee in this House or the other.

Mr. FERRY. Then I ask the Senator how he is competent to judge and say that removing the post-routes from the labors of that committee would take away nine-tenths of the labor of the committee?

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon if I said that.

Mr. FERRY. After my statement that there were more nominations and more controversies on nominations before that committee than any other committee of the Senate, and the Senator from Kentucky cannot gainsay that.

Mr. BECK. If I said nine-tenths of their actual labor, I made a mistake; but that is certainly nine-tenths of the bulk of the work that is presented here. I believe it is the only bill that committee is required to present.

Mr. FERRY. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the reclassification of mail matter and changing the compensation for transportation, in a bill which passed at the last session, involved a great deal of labor during the session. The Senator must have lost sight of that. The Senator thinks the labor of that committee is entirely confined to post-routes, and they are of so little consequence. Let me say that the Senator from Kentucky and other Senators are very tenacious and very glad to go through all the routine to have their particular routes at the Confederate Cross Roads put upon the bill, and are very anxious to see it done. The Senator has plenty of opportunity to offer a bill which covers all the post-routes of the country in the way he now suggests; but he has not done it, or he has not pressed it. If he has failed to do that, he should be the last one to criticise the labors of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress I introduced exactly the bill I am speaking of, and had it referred to that committee. I will furnish the Senator a copy of it. He was chairman of the committee at that time. I spoke then of the absurdity of going through all that thing. Whether or not the committee have an immense amount of other work to do I have not said; but I know that the great labor of their clerk is the making up of this long useless detailed bill. If I spoke of its being nine-tenths of the committee's work I meant nine-tenths of the clerk's work was in making up that bill, which I think can be disposed of in three lines. Gentlemen of the committee have doubtless many questions to consider. The nominations submitted to them of course are numerous. I suppose there is one in a hundred of them that is contested. I do not know what the clerk has to do with them except to write down the list of names. One gentleman takes the cases in two or three States, another two or three States, another two or three States, and they ascertain whether there is any objection to the nominees or not. The postmasters' nominations, I think, go through the executive sessions with as much readiness as any other, except that once in a while there is a controversy about them; but the clerical labor is not very much increased by that. I suppose the labor of the Senators themselves is added to by the large number of nominations.

But I do not care about that. The present point is simply this: shall we begin now, even with this meritorious and hard-working committee, to change a per diem clerk to a permanent clerk and thereby enable, and perhaps make it proper, perhaps make it the duty of the gentlemen representing other committees to ask for the same privilege and thus add $28,000 at least to the annual expenses of the Senate, or shall we wait until the committee now appointed and who I am advised are performing their duty carefully, report to us just what ought to be done? That seems to me to be the only question.

Mr. MAXEY. The committee should not reject a meritorious claim because one not meritorious may be presented.

Mr. BECK. Not inserting it now would not be in any sense a rejection of the claim, in my opinion. The Committee on Appropriations have presented this bill, standing upon the law and conference reports, as it now is, and a claim is made to add to it. We see the difficulties it will lead to, and we ask gentlemen to wait until the committee make a report to show what is important and what is not important, and not add twenty-six more permanent clerks, or the larger proportion of them, so as to increase largely our already heavy expenses until we have the proper information from the committee we have appointed.

Something was said about the labor of the Committee on Appropriations. I know something about that. I never was upon the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, but I have been on the Appropriations Committees in both Houses. It was said by my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] that he believed the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations to the Senate did not have more than one-tenth the work to do that was done by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the House. I have served on both committees, and the clerk of the House committee when I was there is still clerk of that committee, and the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate in the last Congress and the present Congress is the same. I know something of the labor of both, and I can only say from personal knowledge that the labor performed by the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate is as much as any one man can possibly do, and is more important, more laborious than that of the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, laborious as that is. And why is it so? The clerk to the Committee on Appropriations of the House can take the bills of the former year and lay them before the committee, and they make the changes and have ample time to do so. The clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has not only to watch every change made in the House, every step that is had upon each item, collate it carefully for the use of his committee, preserve it, and have it laid in the most intelligent form before his committee, but he has to receive all the communications of every Department the moment they come and have them put in order and kept in order; to have the laws passed from time to time carefully collated, because when the bills come to the Senate, generally at the heel of the session, they come upon us with such a rush that we are forced to act so promptly and hastily that unless our clerk has spent his whole time in faithfully and carefully preparing everything in advance and have everything ready it could not be done. None of that sort of work falls on the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, faithful and competent as he is. I know from personal knowledge that the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of this body at the close of the last long session of Congress never left the committee-room, even to go to his home, for nearly three weeks before the adjournment. He was certainly there night and day for the last nine days of the session. I know he worked until from one to three o'clock in the morning, and for the last five until the sun shone in the morning, and had to be with his committee again at nine o'clock to go on with the next day's work.

The amount of labor that has to be done by that committee under all the exigencies, driven as we are, depends on the efficiency, the activity, the intelligence, the formal and careful preparation of bills by the clerk taking in all that the House has done or said, all that the Departments desire, having everything in perfect order so that he can turn his hand to everything in a moment; without him I do not see how the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate would do its work at all. I am sure that there are bills I could not manage unless I had him by my side, standing by and aiding me with the information it has taken him months—yes, years—to acquire. I do not know what his politics are. We have not changed him; and so it has been with the clerk of Appropriations in the other House. Neither the House nor the Senate have thought of changing these particular clerks. I felt compelled to say that much for the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, and for that committee, Mr. President, we are not feathering our own nest in any improper sense, but we are endeavoring to secure the aid we must have, what the exigence of our situation requires, and we have retained a competent man without whom we can make no progress at all satisfactorily.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY. I have made no allusion whatever to the Committee on Appropriations, much less to the clerk of the committee, for I have had occasion to go before that committee; I have been on conference committees connected with matters coming before the Committee on Appropriations, in the interest of the Post-Office Department, and I have been an observer of the industry and ability which have been exhibited by the clerk of that committee. I have made no criticism whatever, and I am here to indorse all that the Senator from Kentucky has said in behalf of the clerk of that committee, and I am very glad that he at this time is defending that clerk, and defending the labor that the Committee on Appropriations perform, but I trust that the Senator will have generosity enough to concede labor also to other committees who are associated with him in the work of this body, and not, because another committee which has a great deal to do asks that the clerk of that committee be placed on a permanent salary, criticise the work of that committee when he knows nothing by personal experience of its labors. It was for that reason that when the Senator made the statement that fixing the post-routes, establishing new post-routes, was nine-tenths of the labor of that committee, I inquired, for I had not seen him present nor had I seen his name on the list, whether he was a member of that committee, in order to know whether he was fitted to judge properly of the labor of that committee.

Mr. BECK. I have already said to the Senator from Michigan that if I stated the post-route bill and business was nine-tenths of the work of the committee, I made a mistake. I meant to say nine-tenths of the clerical labor was employed on a long detailed bill that could be dispensed with, and I endeavored to show how. I suppose there is no doubt about it. I intended to say that long and useless bill constituted nine-tenths of the clerical labor of the committee. But I do not propose to say more now than I have. If any other committee shall ask the same thing I should be compelled, as I am doing now, to state the reasons why the Committee on Appropriations did not give them permanent clerks. The Committee on Naval Affairs and many other committees have not got them, and I would beg them not to insist upon the Committee on Appropriations now giving them permanent clerks unless they come with a proposition to give all the leading committees permanent clerks and let the Senate overrule us as to all, at once. We do not think it a good time to increase the permanent committee clerks of the Senate; therefore we did not feel that we ought to increase this one and let the others stand as they are.

That is all I care about saying. I was instructed by the committee to make this presentation. I have done it perhaps in a bungling way; but these are substantially the reasons why we have taken the position we occupy. I am not sure but that every committee ought to have a permanent clerk. I have said that I thought every Senator ought to have a clerk paid by the Government, or by his State, while the Senate is in session. There is not a man on this floor that does not need the active, constant service of some one to do his clerical work, to go for him to the Departments, to acquire information and to attend to his correspondence, so that he may look after the wants of his constituents and at the same time do his duty in this Chamber. At the same time I do not want to break into the established system at present, either in this or any other case.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As a member of the Post-Office Committee, I perhaps ought to say that I have no doubt the labors of the clerk of that committee are perhaps as onerous as those of most annual committee clerks; and the chairman of the committee understands my view on the subject. As I believe, there is as much claim on the part of this committee for a permanent clerk as on the part of most other committees that have them, still I do not believe that we ought to increase the expenditures for running the Senate.

There is one committee that has an annual clerk, of which the Senator in the chair [Mr. EDMUNDS] is now chairman, the Committee on Private Land Claims, but I would not deprive it of an annual clerk, because, as has already been said, that is a committee which has been awarded to the minority on this floor, and I believe it is right and proper that they should not only have a committee-room, but have an annual clerk to attend to any duties the minority may wish performed, whether they belong to the committee or not. I therefore should be opposed to striking down that committee from the list of annual clerkships; but in reference to all the rest, the Pension Committee and the Post-Office Committee, I think we had better let them remain just where they are.

I do not believe we ought to have so many annual committee clerks at salaries of $2,200. Who fill these places generally? They are young men. There is scarcely a young man in my State I know but what would be glad to have a clerkship at a thousand dollars a year. I say here now that when I was twenty-five years of age I should have been glad to have employment at $1,000 a year myself; and to give these young men $2,200 for the service they perform to a committee here in my opinion is exorbitant, and I believe it is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to cut down the pay of some of these clerks. It is too much. One-half the farmers in my State do not raise from their farms, where their capital is invested, produce that amounts to $2,200 a year. There are not one-half the citizens of my State who make annually that amount of money. In the town in which I live there is a cashier of a bank, with a capital of $600,000, whose salary is $1,200 and the house in which he lives, managing a large financial institution, and who has managed it for many years, and managed it well; and yet we talk about giving clerks to committees of this body $2,200 as if it was a very trifling sum. If the money came out of our own pockets we should have a perfect right to do it; but we represent here the tax payers of the country. We are appropriating the money of the people who have sent us here, not as they would appropriate it, but appropriating it according to our own views, according to our own wishes and desires. There are a good many increases by the Committee on Appropriations over the bill as it came from the House, and I say in the presence of the chairman of that committee that in my opinion it is very unwise as a general rule to make these increases.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend from Delaware and I agree generally on the subject he is now talking of; but I will say for his information that the amendments made by the Appropriation Committee are putting the salaries just at what they are now by law, not an increase or a decrease; but the Committee on Appropriations endeavored to reinstate all the employés as they now exist. What may be the case when the committee appointed by the Senate to re-examine and re-adjust the salary and number of employés reports, I cannot tell; but all the amendments here now are putting the employés back just where the existing law places them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That I am aware of; but I, as one member of the democratic party, and my friend, the chairman of this committee, as another member of the democratic party, have been crying out in bold, loud, sonorous tones against the extravagance of our republican friends. I was honest in the utterance of those opinions, and I am now willing to put in practice the doctrines which I preached, and I am not honest if I do not intend to do it. I charged upon the stump in my State and everywhere else that there had been extravagance in the expenditure of the public money by the republican party. Now we have come into power, and I hold that, as honest men, we are bound to practice the doctrines which we preached and to economize in the expenditure of this Government; and the people will not have confidence in us and ought not to have confidence in us if we do not do it. I say this, and I take pleasure in saying it in the presence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and in the presence of my brethren of the democratic party, that we shall not be worthy of the confidence of the people of this country, after having stood up and proclaimed on every stump in the land the extravagance of the republican party while they had the management, if we do not put into practice the economy which we preached.

Sir, I am not only for economy so far as the expenses of the Senate are concerned, but for economy in reference to every Department of this Government. I utter to-day the honest sentiment of my mind when I say that the expenses of this Government can and ought to be reduced from thirty to fifty million dollars annually, and, if my voice can prevail in the democratic party while it is in the ascendency, such reduction shall be made. I would commence at the head of the Government and reduce the salary of the President to where it originally stood when as good men as the present Executive performed the duty of the executive office for $25,000 a year. I would commence if necessary with our own salaries and cut them down, and I would commence with curtailing the expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives; I would go through every Department and every bureau of this Government, and I would cut down the expenses of your Army and your Navy. In my judgment we do not need any such Army as twenty-five thousand men in this country. Why, sir, during the administration of President Grant we spent about $200,000,000 upon the Navy of the country, and yet when he went out of office it was in a worse condition than when he went in, and not in half as good a condition as it was in 1860 when the republican party took possession of this Government. Sir, I want to see the expenses of this Government reduced. They ought to be reduced, and I hope my brethren of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, if bills come up extravagant from the House, will cut them down and stand by their reductions.

Now, Mr. President, I have uttered my sentiments honestly, and I mean by my votes to practice what I preach, and if I shall be impotent to have any influence with my brethren in the democratic party who have the control, for the present at least, of the expenses of this Government, then it will not be my fault, for I proclaim it openly and publicly we shall be untrue to the trust committed to us unless we reduce the expenses of this Government and relieve the tax-payers of this country from the onerous impositions and burdens which have been placed upon them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the clerks of committees of this body are a very important corps, I admit, and there are certain committees that ought to have permanent clerks, but I think all of those committees are already supplied with permanent clerks. The clerks of committees now receive $7 a day, including Sundays.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Six dollars, I will say to my friend.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do they not usually get 20 per cent. added, making $7.20?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No; $6 is a fixed rate in the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, $6 a day, including Sundays, while in session.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then we usually extend the pay a short time after the close of the session, a month, in order that they may have time to wind up all the business of their committees before they leave the city.

Undoubtedly the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has a great many nominations; but what has the clerk to do with them? He simply records them in a book and states what is done with each particular case. The cases are given out to each member of the committee according to the locality, and he ascertains whether there is any objection to a nomination. I will guarantee that the clerk of that committee is not required to work two hours a day during the whole session on an average, leaving Sundays out; and yet he draws pay for the Sundays; and I think as the clerk of that committee has got along pretty well for a great many years, and as in all probability he will get along pretty well for a good many years to come, we had better leave his case pretty much as it is. I think there are at least six or eight other committees that are equally entitled to permanent clerks as the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. And I hope, as my honorable friend from Kentucky suggested, that we shall leave things as they are.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, it seems to me that the statements which have been heretofore made ought to be conclusive with the Senate on this question. The Post-Office Committee know better what they have to do than anybody else. The junior Senator from Michigan says we have a great many nominations, and all the clerk has to do is simply to record them and hand them out. I think the Senator from Kentucky said there might probably be a contest over one nomination in a hundred. I venture to say that there is not a member of that committee but what knows that there are at least twenty contests out of every hundred that come up ordinarily, and some of these contests run over months. We have had contests over post-office nominees that have required an investigation not only in the Post-Office Department, but where the parties had been officers in some other Department we have had to go and look into their accounts there, and we have had to seek testimony where charges were made against their moral character in the places where the nominee was to serve; and these things require an immense amount of time.

Then we have applications in cases where post-offices have been robbed. The question comes up, Shall the Government pay the loss or put it on the officer? A claim is presented here and referred to the Post-Office Committee. We have to examine most critically in the proper bureaus of the Post-Office Department and get the testimony as to whether the facts corroborate what is alleged to have taken place. All these things require labor and require skill; and a mere ordinary clerk who can write a good hand is not the kind of man for that committee. It is a committee which deals with a great Department, and a committee which is nearer to the people in its duties than any other committee of this body.

It seems to me that the character of economy which we have heard preached here is simply saving at the spigot and wasting at the bunghole. The great charge which has been made against the Congress of the United States is hasty, inconsiderate legislation; and if the bills which we present were carefully considered before they came here, all the light thrown on them that can be thrown, it would certainly be of immense importance. I have already shown that the duties devolving on the members of the Post-Office Committee, in other committees as well as that, prevent them attending to all these details. They have not got the time; there are not enough hours in the day for them to go personally and examine into all these things. If you have a clerk who is competent, who understands the Post-Office laws, who is a business man, he can brief the facts and brief the law as it exists as well as that which is proposed, and present to the committee clearly the case, so that we can act upon it advisedly and intelligently, and then report to the Senate. All these things require time.

You cannot, in my judgment, get a man who will for the $6 a day for three months one year and, say, seven months another year devote his whole time to that kind of business, because if he comes here as a clerk he is thrown out of business elsewhere the rest of the year. Now, the clerk of the Post-Office Committee is a young man who is, for his age, quite a good lawyer. He also has had experience in a bank as assistant cashier. He has the qualifications and the character that our committee exactly need; and where you trust this committee with the important duties which it has, I say common justice demands that you should furnish that committee the means of discharging those duties; and they come and tell you that they need this service.

Now, in reference to what was said that the Senator from Kentucky saw so much to harp on, that the Committee on Appropriations feathered their own nest, I made that remark myself in a pleasant way, at the same time stating that the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations ought to be a permanent clerk. I do say that he has not got as much to do, in my judgment, as the clerk of the Post-Office Committee has; yet it would be folly to turn out as competent and efficient a man as he is and put in one inexperienced and inefficient; and the very statement made by the Senator from Kentucky proves the correctness of what I said. He properly defends the importance of having the Appropriations Committee clerk a permanent officer, and the exact reasons which he gives for that committee, which he knows all about, we come forward and give for the committee about whose workings we know everything necessary to be known. So then, as I say, if the Senate regards the Post-Office Committee's recommendations about their own business as worth anything, this ought to be done.

But the Senator from Kentucky says that he believes there ought to be more permanent clerks, and that even the Senators themselves should each have a clerk; and yet in the same breath he opposes this amendment because the Appropriations Committee has not acted upon it. Why, Mr. President, this matter has been discussed in the Senate, and the Senate of the United States is capable of determining these things. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says they have only restored the clerks to what they are entitled to by law. It is within the knowledge of the Senate that that committee did make the clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs a permanent clerk; and it was done at this session, and, therefore, not according to any previous law, and I say that he ought to be made a permanent clerk. I know the working of that committee; he ought to be a permanent clerk; and the very same reasons which justified and induced the committee in making the clerk of the Military Committee a permanent clerk should make the clerk of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads a permanent clerk also.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I concur with my friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] in the arguments he has submitted to the Senate, in the main. I think one of his arguments, however, was rather injudicious. The effort now is to establish some principle by which we can economize and prevent waste of the money that the people pay. My friend from Delaware says that he is in favor of reducing the salary of the President of the United States from $50,000 to $25,000 a year. I am apprehensive that he forgot the fact that in all likelihood he was touching the interests of a great many Senators on this floor, [laughter,] there may be a large interest here in the question of reducing the President's salary, because there is no telling how many expect to receive that salary the year after next. [Laughter.]

But I got up to say a word with regard to the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] He said, I think, a few days ago, that I had stated there was ten times as much labor devolved on the clerk of the House Appropriations Committee as there is on the clerk of that committee in the Senate. He made one mistake and acknowledged it to a gentleman across the way, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] and he made another, almost in the same language, in relation to myself the other day. I did say that the clerk of the House committee did ten times as much work as the clerk of the Senate Committee on Appropriations; but in the very next breath, the very next sentence as reported in the RECORD and spoken in the hearing of my friend from Kentucky, I said that probably that was too large a statement of the disparity; but that the duties and labors of the one clerk were greatly more than those of the other. He ought to have done me the justice to have quoted me correctly, and not put me in a position that I do not think is correct.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senator from Alabama that I remembered generally that he said "ten times as much." I have not referred to his speech in the RECORD; but I am willing now to take back anything incorrect that I stated about anybody.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not care about the Senator's taking it back; all I regret is that he did not hear the very next sentence immediately following that to which he referred. But let that pass.

I now repeat, notwithstanding the Senator's argument to the contrary, that the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the House must have largely more to do than the clerk of the same committee here. Why? The Senator said that the clerk there takes the old bills and lays them before the committee, and they make the changes needed. If they have adopted that rule of practice, it is a very extraordinary one, and I suppose that the gentleman must be mistaken. I take it for granted that the Committee on Appropriations of the House, as the Committee on Appropriations here ought to do, take the estimates of the Departments and base their action upon them, adopting some and rejecting others, according to their own judgment. But he says the committee here have all the old laws to look into. They have just as much occasion to refer to them in the committee of the House as here.

But, Mr. President, I understood that the Committee on Appropriations in the House and the committee here have not only one clerk at a large salary, of $2,500 probably, but I learn from a remark made by the chairman of the Post-Office Committee that they have also an assistant clerk to each committee at some $1,600 besides. Think of it! Two clerks to one committee! I never heard of the like of that until the last debate. I understand it is so in the House as well as in the Senate. I hope that that will be stopped. I have no idea whose fault it is. I have no idea my friend from Kentucky would have brought into existence that which it seems to me, and I presume must seem to him, to be certainly a pretty abundant supply of clerks. Now, if we propose to economize at all, if we propose to do anything toward relieving the people from excessive taxation, it does look to me that we might commence, and if not upon a pretty large scale, on the largest we can get a chance at now. Wherever an excrescence is found, wherever an impropriety is discovered, there let us commence and let us continue it up and down and round about and in every direction until your economy shall place the administration of the Government upon a true principle.

I have no disposition to make an assault upon any organization. That is not what I am trying to do. I do not know but that the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses may each need two clerks; but I confess that I do not think they do; and as a Senator, if I had a chance to vote on the question, I would vote to put one of them out as certainly as I live. I intend economy in earnest, and wherever I think a thing is wrong I will vote against it if I get a chance to vote, believing these small beginnings lead to improper growth; these small things grow into large ones; moderate at first, they extend and extend until there is no telling how many clerks to committees we shall have here, and how many other things, much of which, in my judgment, ought to be prevented and suppressed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I submit to my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] whether he wishes to go on now or not? If not, I have a few words to say on this amendment.

Mr. EATON. I shall be very glad to go on now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If it will not interfere with my friend, who is entitled to the floor, I should go on now; but I will yield to him.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, before proceeding to the consideration of the great question now before the Senate and the country, I shall allude to certain matters personal to myself, remarking, however, that properly what I may say regarding those will apply as the opening words of my views upon the powers of the Government of the Federal Union and the governments of the States.

On the 16th of last month the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] charged me—I use his words—with calling the United States a confederacy of States. His manner and his language implied, as it seemed to me, a charge against my political character, coupled as it was with unjust and violent and denunciatory language of other men. I ought to say in justice to myself that I should have alluded to this matter on the following day, but for the absence of my honorable friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] and also on a succeeding day but for his absence; and therefore, although it is a long while since and I have suffered, not from my friend from Maine but I have suffered not a little from unpleasant newspaper attacks because I had failed to do what I agreed to do to the honorable Senator from Maine, in justice to myself I ought to say that I should have made this amende, if it be an amende, at all events I should have attended to this matter on one or two days succeeding the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts but for the absence of my friend from Maine. Now, I will read from the RECORD of the 18th of April. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said:

> Little further is wanting to show what the purpose of this party is.
> Referring to the democratic party.
> I do not care to call attention to the fact that this Government is called, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] called it the other day, a confederacy of States.

Why he alluded to it if he did not wish to allude to it, is more than I can possibly conceive. Then this occurred:

> Mr. EATON. Will my friend pardon me one moment? Is not this a confederacy of States; and did not Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, pronounce it to be a confederacy of States?
> Mr. DAWES. I do not know. I know that the Constitution makes it a nation and not a mere confederacy of States.
> Mr. EATON. It would be well to learn before the Senator charges me with something monstrous.
>
> Mr. DAWES. I do not know whether Daniel Webster called it a confederacy of States; I know the Senator from Connecticut did.
> Mr. EATON. I did; and I shall do so a great many times more if I live.
> Mr. DAWES. Very likely. I know that that is the language used by those who say they have come back here to accomplish under the forms of legislation what they tried but failed to accomplish on the battle-field, namely, to establish their right to leave this Government peaceably whenever they choose—the right to make the State sovereign over the United States Government. If anything was settled by the war, so settled that it will never be unsettled even by the temporary ascendency in these two Houses of those who sought to make another government of it, it was settled that a State could not peaceably secede from this Union, and that this is a nation, a union of States, not an association of them. It is still true that this is the Congress of the United States, not of the Confederate States, of America.
> Sir, I was about to say that the bill before the Senate is defended upon the open and avowed ground that there is no such thing as the peace of the United States; that there is no authority of the United States in any State in this Union over and above the authority of the State, the infraction of which is a disturbance of the peace of the United States.

I have read that much of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] because I desire to say in this connection that the war has not changed the Government of the United States in any particular. The late terrible civil conflict through which we have passed has not changed the Government of the United States and I thank God for it. In no sense, in no way, in no manner has the Government been changed. The Government of the United States is founded upon the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution has been changed, but not by war. How changed? Changed by the sovereign States of this Union, not by war. The proclamation of President Lincoln did not take the fetters from a single slave, not one. He characterized what the act would be by his reference to a pope's bull against the comet. He spoke of those things usually in a sharp manner. I say that of itself the proclamation of the President did not take the fetters from a single slave. The war did not; it was not done until the sovereign independent States of this Union changed the Constitution of the United States; and I regret to say that States which were sovereign enough States, which occupied a position solid and sound enough to amend the Constitution of our common country, were not permitted in other respects to be called sovereign. But yet that is a truism. If any gentleman desires to deny it, I shall be glad to give him my time right here. It took the action of the States of this Union to change the Constitution, to introduce the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to that instrument; and until it was so amended slavery was not abolished anywhere.

Let no reporter, no newspaper man either misunderstand or misrepresent my position. I expect to read to-morrow that I spoke a piece, that is the way they print it sometimes, in favor of slavery. That is not the question. The question is simply, what abolished it? The action of the States abolished it. It could not be abolished until then. Not even the great republican party that had been through this war as the confessed leaders in the war, not even that great party with all its power, not the oligarchy of fifteen under the lead of a celebrated statesman from Pennsylvania that governed the House of Representatives, and governed the Senate, and governed the President at the same time, could abolish slavery. It required the independent action of the independent, so called, States of this confederacy of States. I said I should call it so again if I lived. [Laughter.]

I do not care to dwell longer upon that point. Now, I say, and I want to say it in very good temper, that the denunciation which has fallen from the lips of some of my brother Senators, men for whom I entertain very great personal regard as they know, toward a section of the country that was lately at war with another section of the country—it was a war of sections. My friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] shakes his head; I say it was a war of sections—this denunciation of southern men without stint and without limit is not wise, it is not friendly, it is not proper. Let us be done with it; let the dead past bury its own dead; and hereafter let us go on, if possible, a band of brothers, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from South Carolia, [Mr. HAMPTON,] with equal rights upon this floor, representing equal sovereignties, and let them be here as friends, not enemies. No man ought to judge and no Senator ought to judge of the motives of men.

Now, Mr. President, it will be perceived that I asked, in this colloquy which I have read, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] a question. I made no assertion. I asked the Senator from Massachusetts if Daniel Webster had not called this a confederacy of States. I did not assert that he had. The Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] with scant courtesy I beg to say, thrust himself into a matter which, if of any consequence, was of consequence to the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, and in a somewhat violent manner he first asserted that I had used a certain expression with regard to Mr. Webster. He probably misunderstood me. I had not used any such expression. Now, suppose I read from another RECORD. I read from the RECORD of the 17th of April.

> Mr. BLAINE—
> Addressing the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]
> Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator yield to me a moment, and only for a moment? I do not know that it is a matter of any importance whatever, but the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON,] in a little interruption of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] said that Mr. Webster had defined this Government as a "confederacy," if I understood him aright.
> Mr. EATON. I did not use any language of that sort.
>
> Mr. BLAINE. What did the honorable Senator say?
> Mr. EATON. The Senator from Massachusetts said that I called this a confederacy of States. I asked him if he knew that Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, had used the same language.
>
> Mr. BLAINE. Not that we have heard.
>
> Mr. EATON. Of which I had heard. He probably had not heard of Mr. Webster's use of that language.
> Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator say that Mr. Webster called this Government "a confederacy of States?"
> Mr. EATON. I said that Mr. Webster called this "a confederacy of States." I say he called it not only a confederacy of States, but a confederation of States.

The Senator from Maine then proceeded to read from one of the volumes of Mr. Webster's speeches. Now, Mr. President, I believe I have some character on this floor for candor. I believe that nobody will charge me with egotism when I say that my brethren on both sides of this Chamber regard me as fair and honest in my political convictions, and that I would make no assertion knowingly that was not true. I desire to say, then, in all frankness—and I should have said it the day after the utterance had my friend from Maine been in his seat—that Mr. Webster did not call this a confederacy of States, in my judgment, at any time. Of course, I have not examined his writings carefully for this purpose; but for a couple of hours I have done so sufficiently to satisfy myself that at no time did Mr. Webster call this a confederacy of States. He said that we were united confederately in his celebrated Mark A. Cooper letter; but that was a letter, not a speech; and therefore upon that I lay no stress whatever. I am perfectly willing to admit, glad to admit, that in that particular I yield to the recollection—and I can hardly call it the recollection, for my friend from Maine only stated that it was not likely he had said so, and my friend from Massachusetts did not venture to say that he had not said so, but on the contrary said very likely he had; but I am frank to say that, in my judgment, Mr. Webster never made use of that expression. So much for that. I also said——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Connecticut will pardon me. As my colleague is absent, perhaps he will permit me to say that I do not think my colleague said that very likely Mr. Webster said so. He said very likely the Senator from Connecticut said so.

Mr. EATON. Do you not think he did?

Mr. HOAR. I believe not; but I may be mistaken.

Mr. EATON. I am very glad, for I do not want to misrepresent either the dead Senator from Massachusetts or the living one, either Mr. Webster or Mr. DAWES.

Mr. HOAR. I say to the honorable Senator—I do not desire of course to interpose in his remarks, but my colleague is absent——

Mr. EATON. Oh, I am very happy to have my friend interpose. I will do no injustice to the absent Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I have it here, Mr. President:

Mr. EATON. Will my friend pardon me one moment? Is not this a confederacy of States; and did not Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, pronounce it to be a confederacy of States?

Of course when that question was put with so much confidence by the Senator from Connecticut my colleague could not undertake to contradict it absolutely. No man would be bold enough to do that.

My colleague said:

Mr. DAWES. I do not know. I know that the Constitution makes it a nation and not a mere confederacy of States.

Mr. EATON. It would be well to learn before the Senator charges me with something monstrous.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know whether Daniel Webster called it a confederacy of States; I know the Senator from Connecticut did.

Mr. EATON. I did; and I shall do so a great many times more if I live.

Mr. DAWES. Very likely.

That was the "very likely" of my colleague.

Mr. EATON. I stand corrected again. I hope my friend will keep a good look. I also said that Mr. Webster asserted the Constitution to be a compact, and that was denied. The fact of whether Mr. Webster called this a confederacy of States, a Federal Union, a Union, or a confederated Republic, is a matter of no earthly consequence; but when you come to principle, it is of consequence whether he called the Constitution a compact, for I assert here, and I think I shall prove it as I go on, that the terms "confederacy of States," "confederated Republic," "Union," and "Federal Union" were used indiscriminately by various men, patriotic men, honorable men, the peers of any men now living or who ever will live as long as God lets the earth remain.

But the question now is this: I asserted that Mr. Webster called the Constitution a compact; that was denied. Why, Mr. President, in the very book, in the very volume that my honorable friend from Maine had provided himself with to checkmate my remarks, in one of those very speeches from which he read, Mr. Webster called the Constitution a compact. He could not help it. I undertake to say that no man of the power of Mr. Webster, that no man with the thorough understanding of the Constitution of the United States and the difference between the States and the Federal Government can avoid calling it a compact when he argues from those stand-points.

Now, I want to go back a moment and I will come to this again by and by. I want to call the attention of this Senate to the address of the first Senate of the United States (let us go back to our fathers) and the response of the first President of the United States, George Washington, to that address. I read from the Senate Journal of May 7, 1789. In that day, unlike now, I will not say that they aped a little the manners of the monarchies of the other world, but they were more formal, not quite so republican as we are to-day, and I use that expression in a general sense, for I am a republican. Therefore the Senate addressed "His Excellency, the President of the United States." I will not read it all; it is not important; it is a long address, but it closes by saying:

We beg you to be assured that the Senate will at all times cheerfully co-operate in every measure which may strengthen the Union, conduce to the happiness, or secure and perpetuate the liberties—of this great confederated republic.

Oh, has it come to this that the very framers of the Constitution, in addressing the President of the United States in 1789, dared to call this a "confederated republic?" I have read from the twenty-third page of the Journal. I will now read from the twenty-seventh page of the same Journal the President's reply, and I will read but one sentence of that reply:

I now feel myself inexpressibly happy in a belief that Heaven, which has done so much for our infant nation, will not withdraw its providential influence before our political felicity shall have been completed, and in a conviction that the Senate will at all times co-operate in every measure which may tend to promote the welfare of this confederated republic.

Even the sage of Mount Vernon called this a "confederated republic." More than that, sir, in twelve times that I have read on this matter he calls it "a confederacy;" and grave Senators here on this floor arraign a peer, their equal, for calling this "a confederacy of States," and intimate that it is the language of those who desire to destroy the Union! Sir, I have no words of scorn strong enough for language of that character.

Mr. President, there was a man once who lived in this country that had the love of his party and the respect of his opponents perhaps to as large a degree as any man that has lived, unless it be Andrew Jackson. I speak of Henry Clay of Kentucky. If he were alive to-day, my impulsive friend from Maine would be very likely to accuse him of belonging to a class of men who desire to destroy the Union, because he did not quite square with his views of what political terms should be used with regard to this people. Let me read what the Great Commoner said in 1833:

Sir, I repeat that I think South Carolina has been rash, intemperate, and greatly in the wrong; but I do not want to disgrace her nor any other member of this Union. No, I do not desire to see the luster of one single star dimmed of that glorious confederacy which constitutes our political sun; still less do I wish to see it blotted out and its light obliterated forever. Has not the State of South Carolina been one of the members of this Union "in days that tried men's souls?" Have not her ancestors fought alongside our ancestors? Have we not conjointly won together many a glorious battle? She has been with us before, when her ancestors mingled in the throng of battle; and as I hope our posterity will mingle with hers for ages and centuries to come in the united defense of liberty and for the honor and glory of the Union, I do not wish to see her degraded or defaced as a member of this confederacy.

We have certainly struck different times. It was a confederacy with Mr. Clay again and again; with Mr. Van Buren; with the hero of Tennessee over and over and over again. Sir, I am bound to say, what every Senator will find if he chooses to examine this question, that the terms "nation," "Federal Union," "confederation," "confederacy of States," and "confederated Republic" have been used again and again and again by the leading men of the country as terms descriptive of this Union; and I ought to say that I have found—and it was not a little amusing—in one paragraph, and not as long as one of Mr. Choate's either, or of some other men that I might name—in one paragraph of a very distinguished gentleman I found the words "Union," "nation," "Federal Union," and "confederation" all used with regard to precisely the same matter, and yet if I venture to say on this floor that this is a confederacy of States I am to be assailed as advocating doctrines and belonging to a class of men that desire to destroy the Union. I do not think any man will charge at this late day that the Great Commoner was not a patriot. If anybody does he had better enter a caveat—I think they call it that; I am not much of a patent lawyer—but he had better enter a caveat at once for a new discovery. I am sure that what Mr. Clay could say I may say.

Now let me read from the inaugural address of President Harrison:

Our confederacy, fellow-citizens, can only be preserved by the same forbearance. Our citizens must be content with the exercise of the powers with which the Constitution clothes them. The attempt of those of one State to control the domestic institutions of another can only result in feelings of distrust and jealousy, and are certain harbingers of disunion, violence, civil war, and the ultimate destruction of our free institutions. Our confederacy is perfectly illustrated by the terms and principles governing a common copartnership. * * * It should be our constant and earnest endeavor mutually to cultivate a spirit of concord and harmony among the various parts of our confederacy.

I might quote to the same effect from the address of Mr. Tyler when taking his position as Vice-President and when assuming the office of President; but it is not necessary to read his words; they are to the same effect. I have not made any allusion to the use of this absolutely proper political term by Madison, Jefferson, Jackson, Van Buren, Calhoun, Wright, Benton, and other great lights of the democratic party. I desired when speaking of Clay and Harrison and Tyler to confine myself to gentlemen who did not belong to the same political party to which I was attached years ago.

Now, a word in regard to the "compact" question. In 1851, in his celebrated Capon Springs speech, the language of Mr. Webster admits of no dispute. Whatever he may have said on other occasions, whatever he said in his great discussion on the floor of the Senate with Mr. Hayne or with Mr. Calhoun, on the occasion of this speech, in the most unqualified manner, he asserted the fact for which I contend, that the Constitution is a compact between parties competent to enter into a compact, to wit, the States. I have at home, but not here, a pamphlet copy of that celebrated speech of Mr. Webster. It is not to be found in the Library here. I understand from the Librarian that there have been copies of it, but they are lost or gone. Therefore I read from Stephens's War between the States, pages 404 and 405, volume 1. The speech was made at Capon Springs, in Virginia, on the 28th of June, 1851, and Mr. Stephens says that this is taken from a pamphlet copy. He says:

The leading sentiment in the toast from the Chair is the Union of the States. THE UNION OF THE STATES!

Mr. CONKLING. Who says?

Mr. EATON. Mr. Webster.

What mind can comprehend the consequences of that Union, past, present, and to come? The Union of these States is the all-absorbing topic of the day; on it all men write, speak, think, and dilate, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof. And yet, gentlemen, I fear its importance has been but insufficiently appreciated.

Further on he says:

How absurd it is to suppose that when different parties enter into a compact for certain purposes either can disregard any one provision and expect, nevertheless, the other to observe the rest! I intend, for one, to regard and maintain and carry out, to the fullest extent, the Constitution of the United States, which I have sworn to support in all its parts and all its provisions. It is written in the Constitution—

Then he quotes from the Constitution—

No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

He proceeds:

That is as much a part of the Constitution as any other and as equally binding and obligatory as any other on all men, public or private. And who denies this? None but the abolitionists of the North. And pray what is it they will not deny? They have but the one idea; and it would seem that these fanatics at the North and the secessionists at the South are putting their heads together to derive means to defeat the good designs of honest and patriotic men. They act to the same end and the same object; and the Constitution has to take the fire from both sides.

He proceeds:

I have not hesitated to say, and I repeat, that if the Northern States refuse, willfully and deliberately, to carry into effect that part of the Constitution which respects the restoration of fugitive slaves and Congress provide no remedy the South would no longer be bound to observe the compact. A bargain cannot be broken on one side and still bind the other side. I say to you, gentlemen, in Virginia, as I said on the shores of Lake Erie and in the city of Boston, as I may say again in that city or elsewhere in the North, that you of the South have as much right to receive your fugitive slaves as the North has to any of its rights and privileges of navigation and commerce.

Again:

I am as ready to fight and to fall for the constitutional rights of Virginia as I am for those of Massachusetts.

Therefore the weight of the great authority of Mr. Webster is added to those who hold the Constitution to be a compact between independent sovereignties. But, sir, the opinions of Mr. Webster, Mr. Calhoun, and all the great men who have gone before us are as naught when compared with that instrument. Had neither of these men ever lived and consequently had neither ever spoken, the Constitution would have been not the less a compact, and why? Because in itself it says that the powers granted are limited. Limited by whom and what? Who limited the powers granted to the Federal Government? The makers of the Federal Government, those that had the authority, the States?

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. EATON. With great pleasure.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator be good enough to show any authority for stating that Mr. Webster said that the States made the Constitution of the United States, as we are on Mr. Webster?

Mr. EATON. I am off Mr. Webster now.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator now is giving us his own views, not those of Mr. Webster?

Mr. EATON. I am giving the Constitution of the United States; I have got through with Mr. Webster.

Mr. BLAINE. As the Senator from Connecticut understands it?

Mr. EATON. I do understand him.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is giving the Constitution of the United States as he understands it.

Mr. EATON. I will read it directly and then the Senator from Maine will understand it better than he does now.

Mr. BLAINE. If you read anywhere in that Constitution that it was made by the States, the Senator from Maine will be glad to hear it.

Mr. EATON. I think I will, and I will prove another thing to the Senator from Maine, that the little State of Delaware or the little State which I have the honor and my friend sitting over the way [Mr. PLATT] has the honor to represent has more power than all the other thirty-seven States combined. Perhaps my friend is not aware of that fact. I say the State of Delaware in one point has more power than all the other thirty-seven States in this Union. And why? Because she is the one party to a compact that cannot be broken until she says it may be.

I was mistaken once, and like myself, permit me to say, I have had the manliness to say so. I will not undertake to say that Mr. Webster ever said that this was a compact between States. I have read what he said in his Capon Springs speech. I draw my inference from that speech as to what he meant. If it was a compact, it was a compact between some parties. That is certain. I never heard of a compact that made itself. It has got legs; somebody has put them there; and if there is a compact, as Mr. Webster said, and the States did not make it, I should like to know who did.

Mr. President, I said that it did not require Daniel Webster, it did not require John C. Calhoun nor James Madison nor anybody else of those great dead men that have gone before us, to prove that this was a compact between the States. Sir, I am able to judge for myself on this subject, and so is my honorable friend from Maine. Let me read article 5 of the Constitution of the United States:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: provided, that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808, shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Is that a compact between parties able to form a compact? By the very terms of that instrument, I repeat what I said a moment ago, the little State of Connecticut is mightier than the thirty-seven other States of this Union. She can reduce to one, if she pleases, upon the floor of this Senate her membership; but the thirty-seven other States of this Union cannot compel it by law, by the Constitution. By force, I agree, it may be done; but it cannot be done, as my friend [Mr. KERNAN] suggests, according to the Constitution; it cannot be done without violating the most sacred compact ever made between a people or peoples. Our fathers knew what they were about. Oliver Ellsworth and Roger Sherman, names that will live as long as any names that are written in the history of the past, were two of the great men of my native State. Oliver Ellsworth and Roger Sherman well knew what they were about when they agreed to this compact.

Another thing: my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] not now in his seat, said that this was a nation and that that is proved any how. That depends on what you mean by a nation. I know, and no gentleman will deny it, that in the convention that framed the Constitution they would not permit the word "national" to be written in the instrument. It was tried again and again, and on the votes of my own State it was defeated again and again; and the word "federal" was adopted. There are national powers in this Government; there ought to be; there must be; but they are not as full and complete and absolute and perfect as in the government of Great Britain. Every lawyer knows that. There are things that constitutionally this Government cannot touch. All the thousand things that go to make up the great sum of human happiness and human misery are taken care of by the individual States. With the foundation, the very base of all society that keeps us together as a people, the institution of marriage, what can the Federal Government do? Nothing. It is as powerless as a babe. It has no power there. That is a right of the State, not of the Federal Government. The Parliament of Great Britain has power over it, because England is in all senses a nation. Yorkshire has no legislature of its own, nor has Scotland, nor has Ireland. There is an imperial Parliament of an imperial power. We are the representatives of a delegated power.

Mr. President, there is another thing, if any other thing were necessary, in this Constitution to show the truth of my statement. How many States did it require to ratify this instrument?

ARTICLE 7. The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.

Not a compact? One of the very terms of the ratification was that eight States should not form it, nor seven, but that it should require nine.

Mr. HEREFORD. And that only bound the nine.

Mr. EATON. Of course, it only bound the nine. There were ten or eleven within a short space of time; but for more than a year the little, glorious republic of Rhode Island, so ably represented on this floor by my two friends, floated her flag all over the world as a free, sovereign, and independent State. No power in this Federal Union, as constituted by eleven States, could control her. She was free, sovereign, and independent. And so of the State of North Carolina; she refused to come in; and there I found my atgument at once. This is in itself a confederation of sovereign States. No man can to-day become a citizen of my State without doing what? Before my honorable friend who sits before me [Mr. JONES, of Florida] and before I can vote in the State of Connecticut, (and therefore my honorable friend from Maine must not go there,) in order to become a citizen, it is necessary to take the oath that is required; every man before he votes in the State of Connecticut holds up his hand and swears that he will support the constitution of Connecticut as a free and independent State, and the Constitution of the United States, so long as he remains a citizen thereof. He takes that oath to the State of Connecticut as a free and independent State. So she is free and independent in every power except those which she has delegated by this instrument. Can the Government of the United States, can this Congress, determine with regard to the descent of property within the State of Connecticut? Can you make any law here determining how any man there shall distribute his estate? No, sir; that is one of the great reserved rights of the State. That is a right over which this Congress has no power.

Mr. President, I have said all that I care to say on that subject, and I was led to think of it because of the assertion I made with regard to what Mr. Webster said and what his views were upon the question of a compact. I now ask to be permitted to say a very few words with regard to the grave matters under consideration here, under thought everywhere in our land. I may speak of past legislation, of past acts of the Executive in connection with the legislation which is now pending before this body. Sir, I am bound to say, to commence with, that the course of this legislation has never met the approval of my judgment. I yielded my judgment in this matter to the opinion of my friends. I yielded it because there was no principle involved at all, for had there been, in my judgment, then it would have been dishonorable to have yielded; but in my judgment we should have presented to the President of the United States these separate bills first. I believed that all this legislation which we seek to repeal was vicious legislation and ought to be stricken from the statute book, and therefore I would have presented to the Executive of the United States separately a bill to repeal each one of these sections of what I regard as vile legislation. If I deliberately examine the legislation of the past and say that in my own mind that legislation was wrong, that law ought never to have been enacted, I have no business to suppose that the President of the United States will not take the same view of it that I do. At all events I should give him a chance to do what I regard as his duty. However, another course was adopted, and I yielded my judgment to the judgment of wiser men.

Now, sir, a word about the Army bill which has been vetoed twice. We are, to use a common expression, at logger-heads with the Executive of the United States. We say that we ought to legislate to strike off the statute-book a certain statute with regard to the Army. We say that it is contrary to the genius of our people, contrary to the traditions of our race, contrary to the opinion of all English-speaking men that there should be an army at the election poll. We say that because we believe it. We passed a bill to repeal certain legislation had some years ago. We saddled that bill on an appropriation bill. The gentleman at the other end of the Avenue put his foot upon it. He undertook to tell us in his veto message (which I have not time to read, and if I had perhaps I would not read it again) what we ought to do; that we ought to go back to the days of the fathers. I do not pretend to quote the language accurately. Is there anybody here who read it? He can correct me if he likes. But the Executive undertook to tell us to go back to the days of our fathers and legislate properly and not to tie riders of this character on appropriation bills. Well, I will not say like good boys, but like quiet men, we did that same thing, and then it was worse than the other, in the opinion of the Executive, and he has thrown down the gage of battle to Congress, and not in a knightly manner either.

In the days of old there were different ways of challenging to the combat. The glove was presented kindly or laid at the feet of the challenged party, or you struck with a blunted spear the shield of your adversary, but the Executive has thrust his gauntlet into our faces. My friend from Maine has been called with great propriety by an enthusiastic friend of his "the Rupert of debate." That had a meaning. Well, the Rupert of Charles I never challenged his adversary in this way. Mr. President, for one I accept the gage of battle. The President of the United States has said to the law-making power, and said it to the only power that can make laws, to the only power that has the right to legislate, that he will use the Army at the polls. I know certain wise gentlemen in this Chamber, and newspaper men as well as members of Congress, have ventured to figure up how much legislative power the Executive has. He has none. The legislative power by the Constitution is granted to the two Houses of Congress. The Executive has not a particle of legislative power. He has a qualified veto, but that is no more legislation than a horse-chestnut is a chestnut horse. [Laughter.]

I say, then, that this man has thrown down the gage of battle. He has said to the Congress of the United States, "I will, if I choose, use the Army at the polls." That is just what he says. I reply to him, and I have heard no other one utter a syllable of the reply; I have consulted with nobody, I have my own convictions and I shall stand on them and by them so long as I live. Whatever other men may do, I shall inscribe on the banner of the great democratic party in letters of living light: Free people, free elections, free ballot. The people can exist without an army, but free institutions have never existed, can never exist, when under the blighting control of a standing army. On that I stand, wherever others may place themselves. Not one man, not one dollar will I ever vote when the captain-general of the United States tells me that he will use the Army at the polls. Let the Army go. Texas can take care of itself, that State which is so ably represented here by my honorable friend before me, [Mr. COKE.] If we were in the habit of taking contracts as some of our old ring friends did in the past, I have no doubt my friend here would take a contract to keep the Rio Grande clear for 50 per cent. of what it costs us. At all events, it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to plant itself on square ground and tell the Executive that he can have no army to use against the liberties of the people.

My friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] the other day, in that sober, dignified manner for which he is certainly universally esteemed, played again and again upon the words using troops to keep the peace at the polls. Before I get through, if I do not forget it, I shall call the attention of my honorable friend, if he remains in the Chamber, to the sort of creatures that his party have placed to keep the peace at the polls. An army to keep the peace at the polls! That is all that Catharine wanted of old Suwarrow, nothing else; and when the old Tartar sent his messenger to her imperial highness, "Order reigns in Warsaw," he kept the peace. He kept the peace, and forty thousand men, women, and children were butchered. Keep the peace at the polls, says the Senator from Minnesota; that is all we require. That is all Louis Napoleon required. He kept the peace at the polls when he was elected president. He kept the peace at the polls when he was elected emperor. I believe there were about seven million and three hundred thousand votes polled, and about seven million and two hundred and ninety-nine thousand were for Louis Napoleon, because he was keeping the peace at the polls with an army. That is the entertainment to which we are invited. "None in mine." [Laughter.]

I believe I do not care to say anything more about the use of the Army at the polls. My friend from Maine figured up what part of a leg, or an arm, or which toe, of any soldier of the United States, there being twenty-odd thousand of them, could be distributed to all the voting places in the country. Mr. President, that is not senatorial. Sir, the little finger of the law is stronger than the loins of a giant. Wherever—and so may it be forever—the flag of the United States floats, its right is enforced legally, we all know. Wherever a corporal's guard of soldiers of the United States under that starry banner rightfully are, they represent the majesty of this great people. Ten men represent the strength and power of fifty million people. That is the reason why State Legislatures have been destroyed at the South. That is the reason why Senators have been placed here in this body who had no title to their seats. The power of the Army placed them here, and yet there were not soldiers enough there to have withstood a charge of three minutes from the men who surrounded them. Everybody knows it. Take, for instance, the city of New Orleans. There were a few troops there. What were they? Nothing on the face of the earth when compared with the fifteen or twenty thousand men who surrounded them; fighting men, men as true as any other man is true to his character as a fighting man. They did not interfere because this little body of United States troops represented the majesty of the United States.

I say that I will have none of this power at the polls in this country. No free nation can exist, no free people can live, if they submit to a power of this character. It is not so in my State, I do not know that it is so in either of the New England States; but so particular have many of the States been that they have prevented even a train-band of their own from appearing in uniform on election day at the polls. My friend from New York [Mr. KERNAN] read the other day the law which was passed by New York in 1801 on this subject; yet gentlemen claim that the great State of New York, which in 1801 said that her own train-bands should not appear in arms at the polls, is in favor of having the Army sent there at the polls. It is preposterous; it is absurd.

Now, Mr. President, a word or two with reference to the bill immediately before the Senate. As I said in regard to the other bill, it goes wrong end first, in my judgment. I should have asked the gentleman at the other end of the Avenue, "Do you want fair men on your juries? Are you willing that the intelligence of the country, of the vicinage should be represented in the jury-box?" I would have presented a bill to secure that to the Executive of the United States in full confidence that he would have signed it, because, in my judgment, he ought to sign it. I can judge in no other way than by reference to what I would do under similar circumstances. I hope he is a fair man; I have believed he was as honest as the general run of men; and I believe there is not one man on this floor but what would say with me, give us a fair and impartial jury everywhere. They ought to do it for two reasons: first, as men representing a stake in society they ought to do it; second, by their oaths they have sworn to do it. There is not a Senator on this floor, according to my conception of the Constitution, who has not sworn to strike those infamous, damnable jury laws from the statute-books of the United States. Men may differ; I give my opinion.

I have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, all of it. There are parts of it that, if I had had the making of, I would have made differently. My friend from Maine is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States. Doubtless if he had had the making of that instrument, he would have changed it in some particulars. Well, it could not have been passed and become the very life of a people except for those amendments which were early attached to it. Every Senator knows that certain amendments had to be made, or Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and other States would not have joined this, I will not say confederacy, but this Federal Union.

What is it that I have sworn to support? I have sworn to make laws, if I make any, in accordance with this instrument:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right—> to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

To what?—

Now, then, I say that there is no such thing, if I may call it a thing, there are no such bodies, in certain States of this Union as impartial juries. They are not there. There are in New York and there are in Connecticut. The jurors that the Government draws in Connecticut are drawn from the State boxes, and I may be pardoned here for digressing to state how. What we call our civil authority, that is, the justices of the peace, grand jurors, constables, &c., meet as a board of civil authority, I think on the first Monday of every January. They proceed to place so many names of jurors in their respective boxes. In the town where I reside we have ninety jurors. Those men are selected by their fellow-citizens without regard to party. I want to say here, and my colleague will agree with me, that in nearly every town in Connecticut, no matter which party is in power, not in all towns but in most, a fair share of the jurors is given to the weaker party. It is so in my own town always. So it is with justices of the peace.

Mr. PLATT. Will my colleague permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. That ought to be the case, but there are far too many towns in the State where it is not the case.

Mr. EATON. I know it is the case to a certain extent. My friend may know better than I. I hope he is wrong and that I am right, and I know he hopes so too. My own impression is that the greater number of the towns divide this thing fairly. It is so with the justices of the peace. In my town there are forty-seven. Hartford is an exceedingly intelligent town and the democratic party has been in power there almost all the time for the last dozen years.

Mr. CONKLING. In spite of that?

Mr. EATON. In spite of that; and we always give to our republican friends of the forty-seven justices of the peace twenty, taking twenty-seven to ourselves. Last year the other side were successful, and, as I am informed, they gave us twenty and kept twenty-seven to themselves. Our jurors are drawn in this way: The marshal of the United States calls upon the various towns in the State for so many jurors. Their names are sent to him, and they become the panel, coming from Hartford, where I reside; from Meriden, where my colleague resides; from New Haven, Union, Willington, and the other towns in the State.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the Senator speaking of jurors in the Federal courts?

Mr. EATON. The petit jurors. In the Federal courts they are taken from the State boxes by the constables of the State upon the request of the marshal of the United States. These are the petit jurors, those who try cases. Whenever a grand jury is desired the marshal of the United States summons that grand jury from the body of the State, making his own selections, because each sheriff in Connecticut, in every county in the State, whenever a grand jury assembles calls that grand jury from the body of the county.

Mr. CONKLING. If it will not incommode the honorable Senator, will he be kind enough to tell us under what law this very orderly and proper proceeding, as he has been describing it, takes place?

Mr. EATON. I have not examined the Statutes of the United States to see whether there is any law for it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the honorable Senator allow me to supply him with that fact?

Mr. EATON. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will remind the Senator that this is done under a statute of the United States this day as applicable to every other State as it is to the State of Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. I remember the statute now.

Mr. CONKLING. So that in every State, assimilating the process and the proceeding to that founded by the State laws, practiced by the State officers in the State courts, namely, the sheriff and others, the national officers are authorized and directed to go on and do the same thing. Now, will my honorable friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. He has said that this sort of impartial jury which has received his encomium in Connecticut does not exist in many of the States. I suppose he means the Southern States.

Mr. EATON. I do.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire why it does not?

Mr. EATON. Beyond all question because of the infamous laws which Congress has passed to prevent the intelligence of the State from being put into the jury-box.

Mr. CONKLING. But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator will pardon me——

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. That is a very general and, if he will forgive me for saying so, a very vague answer to be addressed to a man of no more intelligence than mine. Will he be good enough to tell me the law or the laws, giving me the substance of them or a citation to them, which he says keep intelligence out of the jury-box?

Mr. EATON. As I cannot stop now to read those laws I will tell my distinguished friend from New York, so that he can proceed at once to read them, that they are the very laws that we intend to repeal.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, Mr. President, if I do not incommode the Senator, I beg to trespass again upon his time.

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. And I do so in order to express my surprise at the statement of the Senator, and to add that I differ with him, absolutely, because this bill proposes to repeal but two sections of the statutes, one a section which makes certain causes grounds of challenge. That statute ought not to be upon the books, because, regardless of its merits, it was repealed, and it came back into the revision by mistake. No point is made upon it, except that when we proceeded again to repeal it at the last session of Congress, there being no objection in the Senate, the bill went to a democratic House, and there lay neglected and disregarded for seventy-four days, during every of one of which the House might have concurred with the Senate in that repeal.

Coming now to the remaining, and the only remaining jury section at which this bill is aimed, it provides that in open court, on motion for reasons stated, the district attorney may propose a certain requirement of one juror or of more than one, and that the court, in its discretion, deciding that motion, may pass upon it.

Now, if the honorable Senator will give me his attention—I see how powerfully he is attracted in another way, but if he will undergo the infliction of giving me his attention for a moment—I beg to submit to him that that section deserves no such denunciation as he bestows upon it, none from a man so wise and so just as he, none from a lawyer who has as much right, as we all know he has, to speak as a lawyer; and it does not deserve that condemnation for these reasons, very briefly stated:

First, it simply addresses to the discretion of the court a fair question to be passed upon in each instance on its merits, and a question so harmless that when the presiding officer of the Senate descended yesterday from his seat there and came to his seat here to expound democratic doctrine he was compelled to confine the instances in which harm would be done to the case of a judge, if I understood him, who was both a knave and a fool. He said that a judge who was a knave and a fool under that section might do the injustice which he described, and I agree with him; it would take a judge who is both a knave and a fool; but inasmuch as judges are usually selected from a class of intelligent persons supposed to be learned in the law, and inasmuch as the presumption of law is that public officers do their duty, the presumption is not that a court would make a decision which could be made only by a knave and a fool. Therefore, I submit to my honorable friend that a statute addressed to judicial discretion carries with it the presumption that it will be affirmatively applied only for good cause; and when he denounces it as infamous and uses the other strong words which I believe he applied, I venture to submit to him that he lays a rather heavy hand upon it.

With one other observation, thanking the Senator for having allowed me this interruption, I will take my seat. This discretion is aimed at men who voluntarily fought or took part in the war which it pleased the honorable Senator, and he said I shook my head,—I shake it again,—to describe as a war fought by one section of this country against another section. I shake my head audibly and by articulation now at that proposition, because I say it was a war waged by one section against the nation, and the nation fought that section and put down its revolt. It was not section against section, but it was a party and a fragment of the country which struck at nationality, and failed.

But apart from that, the war ended in 1865. So the Supreme Court say, so history says. That was over thirteen years ago. The armies which fought that war were recruited a good while before the war ceased; so that, practically, the man who was old enough to have done the acts at which this section is aimed is now in the neighborhood of forty, he is at least thirty-five; and speaking of all the men in the South less than forty, or thirty-eight, or thirty-six, or thirty-five, wherever the honorable Senator may please to draw the line—speaking of all men of less age than that, this statute has no more application to them than it has to the hanging gardens of Babylon or the hundred gates of Thebes. Every man up to thirty-five, no matter how much of treason he had in his heart, no matter how much he longed to prostrate the nationality, to destroy our institutions, may sit on a jury. This section is applicable to none except those old enough to be the survivors of the war, and when applied to them it simply asks of the court, with the whole public looking on, to say whether as to one juror or one panel it is right or wrong that the jury should be purged.

I have only this to say, Mr. President, as a comment of my own: I am entirely opposed to any repeal or permission under which white-leaguers, night-riders, incendiaries, murderers, or violators of the law of any description, are to be tried before a jury composed of their own accomplices; and by as much as this section lodges in the discretion of the court power in instances of that sort to apply at least one test, I again submit to the Senator from Connecticut, who did not misdescribe himself when he said he had a right to claim candor as among his virtues, who will not misdescribe himself if he says he has a right to number courage and principle among his qualities—I submit to him, who is strong enough and brave enough to be candid, that all of this talk about the section to which I have referred is a new illustration of what he studied in school in some book of physics under the title of Indefinite Expansibility of Matter. It is a wonderful illustration of the capacity of human wit to fill a continent with noise over something so small that, if it be not nothing in reality, it is next to it in the scale in which it ought to be weighed.

Mr. EATON. Now, Mr. President, I beg to say that my friend, when asking to put a question to me or to make a brief statement, ought not to make a speech in the middle of mine. I can answer the gentleman's speech, but without the redundancy of his rhetoric, for that I do not possess.

Mr. CONKLING. Never mind the rhetoric.

Mr. EATON. We are taught in the different schools various styles of rhetoric; but I know, and I repeat it, that in the Southern States to-day juries are packed and honest men are kept from the jury-box.

Mr. CONKLING. Who packs them?

Mr. EATON. They are packed by the act of attorneys and judges who are not honest men; and before I get through I will satisfy my friend from New York that as honest judges as he has ever practiced before have appointed most infamous rascals as deputy marshals and jurors. I know this to be true not by personal vision; I have not been at a court, I do not know that my friend has, in any of the Southern States; but there are gentlemen on this floor to-day who know what is done in their court-houses, what has been done within the last six months; and it is no answer for the Senator from New York to say here that nobody under thirty-five years of age could be challenged in a jury-box. That will not do; it is too thin. A boy fourteen years of age in 1865 would not be thirty-five years of age to-day. It is the sons of men who were in the war; not only the men who were in it, but their sons, those who were mere boys and children when the war ought to have closed.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not mean that boys who were only fourteen in 1865 were in the war?

Mr. EATON. I have not said they were, nor is it necessary that men should have been in the war in order to be kept out of the jury-box. It may be inferred from the question put by the Senator from New York that that is not so. I shall be obliged to my friend from Indiana if he will read that section which he has before him.

Mr. VOORHEES. Section 821 reads as follows:

At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or veniremen or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

Mr. CONKLING. That does not say anything about boys thirteen years old.

Mr. EATON. Boys thirteen years old, as I am informed by men who know more about it than the Senator from New York or myself, are not infrequently tolerably well-developed boys.

Mr. CONKLING. And they do what?

Mr. EATON. They put themselves in a position where they cannot take this oath, and therefore as honest men they are put from juries.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from Connecticut will pardon me for one moment. Something has been said about no judge but a knave or a fool ever permitting this test oath, as it is called, to be submitted to a juryman. I desire to state that I was present in court in Charleston on one occasion in 1877 at which the Chief-Justice of the United States was presiding, and that there I saw him authorize the administration of this oath.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will yield to me now for one moment. I hope that the Senator from South Carolina is the only Senator, the only person in all this audience, who understood me to say that a judge must be a knave or a fool to apply this section. Unfortunate indeed must I have been if I said that. I said, I thought, at all events I will endeavor to say it now, that the leader of the democracy on this floor, when pointing to a case in which it would be improper affirmatively to apply this section, said that it might nevertheless in such a case be applied by a judge who was a knave and a fool, and I said I agreed with him. My recollection is he took the case of two boys interested as heirs in a piece of real estate lying in the South, and he talked about this section being applied in a case like that, and he said a knave and a fool might apply it. I said that I agreed with him, but that the presumption was, judges not as a rule being either knaves or fools but instructed in their duties, that they would confine its application to those instances for which it was intended, namely, instances of issues to be tried such in their nature as to appeal to the bias, the prejudice, the preconception, the political feeling supposed to survive from the struggle to which the oath refers. Certainly I did not intend to intimate that the Chief-Justice or any less judicial magistrate than the Chief-Justice would be blamable in any sense for applying this in a case for which it was intended. I remember the instance in which the Chief-Justice applied it, and the record will testify that had it been a more searching and effectual criterion, more justice would have followed than came from the panel in South Carolina at the time to which I refer.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. My friend will pardon me just a moment.

Mr. EATON. The speech of the Senator from New York was so long that perhaps the Senator from South Carolina ought to have an opportunity to answer it.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely desire to give the Senator from New York another piece of information with which perhaps he is not so familiar, which has come within my knowledge and under my observation within the last two months in Charleston, South Carolina, where the circuit judge and district judge were presiding. There I saw the test oath administered to every democrat who presented himself to the jury and not administered to a single republican, and among those republicans were certainly three confederate soldiers, one of them having been a lieutenant under my command, and to whom the test oath was not submitted. That is the kind of jury to which I presume my honorable friend from Connecticut refers when he speaks of packing juries to convict. That I witnessed myself.

Mr. CONKLING. That judge must have read that entry on a sacred record, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps so, Mr. President.

Mr. CONKLING. I cannot account for it in any other way.

Mr. BLAINE. How did the judge know which were democrats and which republicans?

Mr. BUTLER. I know it just as I know the honorable Senator from Maine is a republican, because he acts with the republican party.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the judge who goes down there know the individual history of every man in the panel?

Mr. BUTLER. The district attorney knows it if the judge does not. The district attorney knows it. He administered the oath, and when a young man who had grown up since the war presented himself upon that jury, against whom not one syllable could be urged, he was rejected peremptorily because he was a democrat.

Mr. EATON. Well, Mr. President, I know this, and if it has not come to the knowledge of the Senator from New York it will probably when he gets to be as old as I, and that is that all judges, whether of the United States courts or of the State courts, are not infallible men by any means. There have been rascals upon the bench, and there will be hereafter. I would place no power unnecessarily in the hands of a court because that court is honest. That is not the way to do. Put as little power as possible in the hands of a court. There was a Jeffreys once, a learned man. He was not a knave and a fool—except that every man is foolish who is knavish—but he was a learned lawyer, a man of talent. He packed juries and convicted men; and the best blood of England flowed on the scaffold when Russell died, though not by Jeffreys—Pemberton was then the judge—but it was the same mode of packing juries in London; and this same mode of packing juries is adopted to-day in this country; they are packed to convict, absolutely packed to convict.

Mr. HEREFORD. We had a Durell.

Mr. EATON. I know we had a Durell. We had once a United States Attorney-General who said about jurors in the United States courts:

There is no uniform system of obtaining jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, and great abuses have sprung up and much favoritism and corruption are complained of. It is easy to provide a uniform mode of selecting jurors for the courts of the United States, and I respectfully suggest that an act be passed to accomplish this result.

We are trying to pass one. That is what was said by an Attorney-General of the United States in 1875 in his report.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not mean that he is trying to establish a uniform system by this act?

Mr. EATON. If we get a little uniform honesty, we are going to have it. We have had uniform dishonesty long enough. We propose ourselves now to see if we cannot have a little democratic honesty if possible, not that which comes out of the slums of anywhere, but fair men and honest men, and men who will do their duty fearlessly. We need them, and we shall show them to you before we get through. Mr. President, I amuse my friends, especially my friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I am glad I can be the source of amusement to great men always. When I can be nothing else, I like to be able to be amusing to my friends.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. EATON. Certainly, I will allow anybody.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see what right the Senator has to say that he amuses me.

Mr. EATON. I thought I did. I will try to do so, then. I will take it back.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. EATON. I will proceed to do it then, if I can.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not amused at anything the gentleman was saying. The Senator from New York and myself were conversing about a matter that certainly did not interest the Senator, and it was that; but still if the gentleman desires it, I can be amused at many things he has said.

Mr. EATON. Doubtless; I hope the Senator has been.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say on this subject of jurors. The right of a fair trial by jury is older than the law, so to speak, older than any well-considered dissertation upon the law, so to speak. It is older than the Saxon heptarchy, older than Alfred. The people of the vicinage, the people of the hundred, were got together for the purpose of trying their fellows. They were supposed to be honest men, fair men. We now propose to have juries of that character. I say further that it is a State right to furnish jurors for the Federal courts. I do not undertake to say that there is any absolute reserved clause to that effect, but I say that for eighty years the States have furnished to the Federal Government, in their own way, jurors always; and if the Federal Government had any right under the terms of the Constitution to provide the manner of constituting a jury, that right has been held in abeyance for more than three-quarters of a century.

Now, Mr. President, a few words in regard to the other section of the statutes we desire to repeal. I ask my friend to find me that section.

Mr. KERNAN. It is section 2022.

Mr. EATON. I desire to read this statute. Section 2022 provides that—

The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

Mr. President, we seek to repeal laws of that character by which the United States has undertaken to control the machinery of State elections. Now I want to read a little with regard to this machinery, and I ask the attention of my friend from New York as well as my friend from Illinois; I shall probably amuse them. It is but a little while ago that the honorable Senator from New York attacked in his vigorous manner the democratic party of New York. He spoke of the vile places—I cannot give all the names any more than the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] could—bucket-men and rat-pitters and shoulder-hitters.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator ought to be more familiar with the names of his clans.

Mr. EATON. I will show the names that I am familiar with before I get through.

Mr. CONKLING. It is said that a great Roman general knew the name of every soldier. My friend does not seem to understand the names of his legions.

Mr. EATON. My friend from New York understands, I believe, and will know the names of his rum-an (Roman) soldiers when I come to read them here, as I shall do directly. I say we desire to repeal a statute of that character which places in the hands of the Government of the United States through its judges the power to appoint men of most infamous character to public office; and they do it. My friend from New York said a little while ago that a man must be a knave or a fool who would undertake to tamper with an honest jury. Well might a man say that a judge would be a knave or a fool to appoint such rascals to office as distinguished republican judges have appointed in the city of New York. We propose to get rid of this law, because its effect has been bad upon New York City, bad even upon its Senator, bad upon all. I want to give a little history of about fifty of these gentlemen.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would the Senator mind my reading to him on that point a report of a committee of the House of Representatives?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. EATON. What does the Senator propose to do?

Mr. EDMUNDS. To read to the Senator a report of a recent committee of the House of Representatives upon that subject.

Mr. EATON. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a very good one.

Mr. EATON. I presume it is if it was made by the present House of Representatives, but I do not care to hear it read just now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was the last democratic House.

Mr. EATON. I have some good reading here of my own which I commend to my friend from New York, to my friend from Maine, to my friend, above all others, from Minnesota. Judge Woodruff I knew very well. He was a Connecticut man, and certainly that helped him to be a good man, and a good judge. He was a Connecticut man who took his carpet-bag in hand and emigrated to New York; and he became there somewhat known as an able lawyer and judge. I think he was judge of some State court in the city of New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Two of them, including the highest court in the city.

Mr. EATON. He was afterward made a judge of the district or circuit court of the United States, I am not certain which.

Mr. CONKLING. Of the circuit court.

Mr. EATON. Very well; he had the reputation of being an honest man.

Mr. CONKLING. So he was.

Mr. EATON. An able judge he was, a fair magistrate, I doubt not; but now I want to show my friend how such judges are imposed on. Either the judge is infamous or those who stand behind him are worse than infamous. I desire to read. Here is the list of creatures that were appointed in 1870——

Mr. CONKLING. What does the Senator read?

Mr. EATON. I read from the Congressional Globe of February 24, 1871.

Mr. CONKLING. Whose speech?

Mr. EATON. I read from the speech of Mr. Vickers, of Maryland, delivered in this Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I always liked his speeches. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. I thought you would. [Laughter.] Now, then, we seek to repeal the power that the United States has and uses in this way. Here is a list of the officers—God save the mark!—officers appointed at the instance of the republican party, on the recommendation of some of its leading men in New York, for the purpose of keeping the peace at the polls. The only argument I ever heard why the Army should be used to keep the peace at the polls is that the republican party appoints such marshals and supervisors. Why, these rascals would steal the very polls themselves [laughter] if an Army was not there to protect them. Let me read; I will only read a few names:

J. F. Baderhop, appointed by this estimable Judge Woodruff, at the instance of some of my friend's "bucket-men" in New York, some of those "shoulder-hitters" and "rat-pit heroes:"

Theodore, alias Mike Anthony, alias Snuffey, of 24 Cherry street, a laborer, thirty-five years of age, married, and cannot read or write. Anthony was arrested by Detective James Finn, of the fourth precinct, on July 24, 1870, for larceny from the person, and was held in $2,000 bail for trial by Justice Hogan. He was indicted by the grand jury on the charge on the 23d of August last.

There is one of the men appointed by as respectable a magistrate as Judge Woodruff to preserve the purity of the ballot-box that the honorable Senator from Vermont spoke of the other day; to preserve the purity of the ballot-box this panel-thief was appointed by a respectable magistrate. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did he appoint him because he was a panel-thief, or did he appoint him because he was imposed upon?

Mr. EATON. I have no doubt he was imposed upon by the recommendation of a leading republican who wanted this man appointed because he was a thief. [Laughter.] We want to get you out of that business. You have been in it too long already; it soils your garments.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator now amuses me.

Mr. EATON. I shall more.

Joseph Frazier—

Another of these blessed keepers of the purity of the ballot-box—

Joseph Frazier, of 279 Water street, is a thief and confederate of thieves.

That is, a union thief. [Laughter.]

James Miller is the keeper of a den of prostitution in the basement of 339 Water street.

James Tinnigan keeps a similar den in the basement of 337 Water street.

James Sullivan, alias Slocum, keeps a house of prostitution at 330 Water street, which is a resort for desperate thieves.

Frank Winkle keeps a house of prostitution at 337½ Water street. The police are frequently called in to quell fights in Winkle's place, and it bears a hard reputation.

Now I come to a good fellow, a great chap. Of course it could not be supposed that the present chief of the supervisors in New York could appoint now any character holding as high a position as this one evidently does in that fraternity:

The radical authorities have appointed one John, alias "Buckey," McCabe a supervisor of the eighth district, Fifteenth ward. He is now under indictment for shooting a man with intent to kill. This precious "supervisor" originated here, and was first known to the police for his dexterity in robbing emigrants. His picture is in the "rogues' gallery" at police headquarters in this city, No. 225. He was known as Pat. Maddon, alias "Old Sow," alias Honsey Nichols, alias Dennis McCabe. His real name is Andrew Andrews. His wife resides in North Pearl street, and the "supervisor" of the eighth district, Fifteenth ward, New York, is down in the directory as a citizen of Albany.

Mr. President, my friend from Minnesota, who is an honorable gentleman, stood in his place in the Senate the other day and said he desired that these laws should be kept in order that there should be a fair ballot and honest supervision of the elections, and he looked just as if he meant it. How does he like this kind of supervision?

Mr. WINDOM. I suppose, as the Senator asks me the question, these were thieves selected to watch the sixty thousand democratic thieves and keep them from voting.

Mr. EATON. My friend does not mean any such thing and cannot get off in any such way. They were hired with your money and mine, Mr. President, for the purpose, if possible, of prostituting a fair and free election in New York. But this is not very pleasant reading.

Joseph Hurtnett, supervisor eighteenth ward. Arrested June 3, 1869, as accessory to the murder of Richard Gerdes, a grocer, corner of First avenue and Twenty-fourth street.

Henry Rail, supervisor eighth ward. One of the principals in the Chatham-street saloon murder; went off West to escape punishment, and has only been back a few weeks.

James Moran, supervisor third district, eighth ward. Arrested on Sunday last for felonious assault.

William (alias Pomp) Harton, (colored,) marshal twenty-second ward. Arrested a few days since for vagrancy.

Theodore Allen—

It appears to me my colleague and myself have a sort of recollection of that name—

Theodore Allen, marshal eighth ward. Now in prison for perjury, and keeps a house, the resort of panel-thieves and pickpockets, on Mercer street.

He is in jail to-day for murder, or is out on bail being charged with murder. Now, who is this man The. Allen? He has been exported from New York into my State in order to interfere in the elections of Connecticut, not, I agree, by any Government action, not by action of the United States officers; far be it from me to make a charge of that character; but he is well known in our State. One of his brothers served a sentence of six or seven years in the State prison of Connecticut. Another one of them staid in the inside of our jail at Hartford on a charge of burglary longer than he cared to, and so one night he left, and they have not heard of him since in Connecticut. His name is not in this list, but the family are a rising family of honest republicans!

Mr. PLATT. If my colleague——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to his colleague?

Mr. EATON. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, as I do not understand exactly to what my colleague alludes, I wish he would be a little more explicit as to what this The. Allen has done in Connecticut. I am ignorant on the subject.

Mr. EATON. My friend was so busily engaged in the practice of the law and had so little to do with politics a few years ago that he has forgotten that one The. Allen, at the head of a gang, was brought into the State of Connecticut for the purpose of influencing the election in our State in certain localities; at any rate it was so charged.

Mr. PLATT. As I always understood the matter, the democratic party got very much frightened one day with the idea that The. Allen was coming there, but in fact he never——

Mr. CONKLING. He is said to be acting with the democratic party now, and has been for some time.

Mr. EATON. My friend does not intend, I suppose, to say that this man The. Allen was ever a member of the democratic party.

Mr. CONKLING. I intend to say, if the Senator will hear me, that the man he alludes to was one of the leaders of the greenback party, so called, in the last election. That certainly is not the republican party.

Mr. EATON. It is possible that there may be greenback men who were republicans. I happen to know in regard to the character of this man, and know that he was never a member of the democratic party. Now let us proceed:

Richard O'Connor, supervisor seventh district, First ward; has been for years receiver of smuggled cigars from Havana steamer.

L. H. Cargill, supervisor ninth district, Ninth ward; tried in United States court for robbing the mail.

John Van Buren, supervisor twelfth district, Eighth ward; was at one time in sheriff's office and discharged for carrying a load of seized goods from the establishment of Richard Walters in East Broadway.

Mart Allen, marshal Eighth ward; served a term of five years in the Connecticut State prison; sentenced to Sing Sing for five years by Judge Bedford. His case was appealed, and while waiting for decision he managed to get out on bail. His case has been decided against him, and he has fled to parts unknown to ply his vocation and help the radicals elsewhere.

John McChesney, supervisor fourth district, Ninth ward; associates with thieves; bears a bad character generally.

William Cassidy, supervisor twelfth district, Ninth ward; is a street bummer, without any visible means of support.

Thomas McIntire, marshal Eighth ward; has been frequently arrested for beating his aged mother; sent several times to Blackwell's Island.

Timothy Lynch, marshal sixth district, First ward; a Washington-market lounger.

Peter Mose, marshal Sixth ward; habitual drunkard.

John Conner, supervisor first district, First ward; keeps a disorderly gin-mill, resort of lowest characters.

Francis Jordan, supervisor sixth district, First ward; lives in New Jersey; was turned out of the post-office by Postmaster Jones for bad conduct.

Bernard Dugan, supervisor eight district, First ward; habitual drunkard. His wife left him on account of his drunkenness, and procured a divorce on that ground.

John Tobin, supervisor ninth district, First ward; arrested about six months ago for grand larceny.

Patrick Murphy, supervisor fourth district, Sixth ward; two years ago distributed fraudulent naturalization papers, and would furnish them to anybody that would promise to vote for Grant.

Edward Slevin, jr., supervisor second district, Fourth ward; has an indictment now pending against him in court of general sessions for cutting a boy named Kilkenny.

Michael Foley, supervisor fourth district, Fourth ward; well-known repeater, voting for anybody that will pay.

James F. Day, supervisor seventh district, Fourth ward; shot at a man in a fight between the Walsh association and a gang from Water street.]

John Conners, "alias Jockey," supervisor third district, Fourth ward; a well-known desperate character.

* * * * * ** *

Michael Costello, marshal Sixth ward; bounty-jumper during the war.

Harry Rice, supervisor thirteenth district, Sixth ward; was connected with the Chatham-street concert saloon murder, and fled to Nebraska to escape punishment.

Thomas Lane, supervisor seventeenth district, Sixth ward; formerly keeper of a notorious den at Five Points, headquarters of thieves and robbers.

John Lane, supervisor twenty-second district, same ward; was indicted for receiving stolen goods. Has served a term in Sing Sing.

Edward Foley, supervisor sixth district, Ninth ward; arrested last year for stealing a watch.

Humphrey Ayers, supervisor eighteenth district, Ninth ward; arrested six years ago for robbing the United States mail.

John Dowling, supervisor nineteenth district, Ninth ward; arrested August 20, 1869, for till-tapping.

James Fitzsimmons, supervisor twentieth district, Ninth ward; rrested August 1, 1868, for robbery.

John Martin, supervisor fifth district, Twelfth ward; rrested a few years ago under an indictment for arson.

Samuel Rich, supervisor fourth district, Thirteenth ward; served a term of two years at Sing Sing for felonious assault.

John, alias "Buckey," McCabe, supervisor eighth district, Fifteenth ward; charged with shooting a man with intent to kill about a year ago.

William P. Burke, supervisor twentieth district, Eighth ward; served his term in the State prison of Massachusetts for burglary; also two years in the New York State prison.

James McCabe, supervisor fourth district, Eighth ward; now confined in the Tombs under indictment for highway robbery.

William Irving, supervisor fourteenth district, Eighth ward; has served a term in Sing Sing prison for burglary committed in the Eighth ward, and has never been pardoned.

Patrick Henry Kily, alias Fred. Williams, supervisor twenty-second district, Eighth ward; keeper of a house of ill-fame; resort of the lowest and vilest characters.

Patrick Hefferman, supervisor of the tenth district, Sixth ward; arrested some time since for attempted murder.

Frederick Sterringer, supervisor Eighth ward; has been arrested several times for keeping disorderly house.

J. F. Baderhop, supervisor Tenth ward; arrested for murder a few years since.

Ed. Weaver, marshal in Eighth ward; has been but a short time out of State prison, where he has been serving out his sentence.

Walter Prince, (colored,) marshal Eighth ward; now in prison awaiting trial for highway robbery.

Andrew Andrews, alias Hans Nicols, marshal; panel-thief; been sentenced two or three times to State prison, and has just returned from Blackwell's Island.

I read this from page 1636 of the Congressional Globe, for the Forty-first Congress, third session, February 24, 1871.

Now, Mr. President, I ask, will honorable men, honorable Senators of the United States say here in their places on the floor of the Senate that a system that is carried and has to be carried out in this nefarious manner—for it is nefarious—is a proper system to be adopted in this country of ours? Sir, I say no, a thousand times no. These men, these thieves, these murderers, these highway robbers the men to supervise an election in the city of New York in the interest of a free ballot!

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I intended. There were other points that I desired to examine at some length; but I forbear—forbear for two reasons: first, I do not like to tire my friends; and, second, because I do not care to fatigue myself. I think that I have added a little to the literature that is now being gathered up in this country for public use. I think I have added a little—no matter how little—to that great mass of evidence which is being accumulated against this system of jurors, in the first place which has been inaugurated by the republican party of this country in other days, and this system of election marshals and supervisors. My own opinion is that a system that requires men of this character as its chiefs, its marshals, its supervisors, is a system that the free people of this country ought to be rid of. There can be no honest ballot supervised by men of this character; it is utterly impossible. Is it a free ballot that you want? Is it an honest ballot that you desire? If so, is this the class of men to supervise you and me when we go to the ballot-box to cast our votes?

We have nothing of this sort in my State. If there was a class of men of this character appointed as supervisors in the State of Connecticut to look after the ballot-box that my friend upon the other side of the Chamber and that I visit for the purpose of depositing our ballot, his voice would be joined to mine to prevent any such thing in the State of Connecticut. I have no doubt about it, not the slightest in the world. I cannot believe that any man, when he brings this case down to himself, would desire to have a supervisor of this character placed at his voting place; and no good can come of it, nothing but evil.

I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate by going into the constitutional question on this subject, which was very ably discussed yesterday by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] I might go a step further than he did. I would say that if there was any doubt with regard to the constitutionality of the law there can be but one opinion with regard to its impropriety. For eighty years there was no such supervision known to the Government of the United States; no claim of that character was made, but the States furnished the supervisors for all elections. Therefore, under any circumstances, if it was a correlative power, a co-ordinate power, the United States suffered that power to lie in abeyance for eighty years; they suffered the States to go on for eighty years. Was there any complaint? Not the slightest. From 1789 up to 1861 was there ever any complaint made? None. Therefore I say if there is any doubt of its unconstitutionality—I entertain none; I believe it to be so—then upon the other great question there is no propriety in the Government of the United States undertaking to supervise State elections. But, say gentlemen on this floor, the Government has a right to do it. Gentlemen on the other floor, the newspaper press of the country, say that this ought to be a government of force: everything is force; it all comes down to force, says the honorable Senator from Vermont. Not that sort of force, not the force of arms, not the force of steel, but the force of honest law honestly enacted and honestly carried out. To talk about requiring these miserable scoundrels, a part of whose names I have read, to become the supervisors of the elections of fair men in the city of New York is not only an absurdity, but it is a crime. It is a crime against justice; it is a crime against our human nature; it is a crime against everything that is right and pure in manhood to put over the polls of a great people in a great city a class of men of this character.

Mr. President, while I live and have the honor of a seat on this floor I shall vote to repeal all laws of this character at all times and in all manners. Join that repeal with an appropriation bill and I shall then vote for it, though I regret to join the two together. I vote for it because in my judgment it is honest, because in my judgment it is right, because in my judgment as a Senator I should dishonor myself to vote in any other way. Again I say while I regret that these measures have been joined together in this way, it is not a matter of principle in any sense; it is a matter of propriety. While it is right in the first place to pass a proper appropriation bill after proper consideration, so it is right to pass a bill repealing a law that you believe to be an improper one; and the joining the two together I dislike; but both are right, and therefore, though joined, I shall vote for the passage of the bill; and sir, when this bill passes here, if it does pass, and it goes to the Executive at the other end of the Avenue, I hope that it will receive at his hands proper consideration, and I trust that he will see his way clear to giving his support and approval to this bill, although like myself—humble as I am I may compare myself with him—he may be opposed to the idea of joining together bills of this character.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, were I about to answer the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] or to attempt to do so, whih I am not, I should begin by complimenting him on his electioneering dexterity. He takes up a volume of the Congressional Globe, venerable in its color and ponderous in its size, and proceeds to read from it. He does not tell the Senate whether he reads from sworn testimony, from the report of a committee, or from something yet more solemn. When pressed to disclose what it is he reads, it is he says a speech—a speech made years ago by one then a Senator from Maryland. The Senator from Connecticut did not state that in reality the statements he read were not made by the Senator from Maryland or vouched for by him but were taken bodily from a partisan newspaper. The page of the Globe before the Senator shows that all this extravagant tale about appointments made by Judge Woodruff was quoted from the New York World. The Senator from Connecticut quotes it all as the speech of the Senator from Maryland. When the next democrat has occasion to impose it upon the credulity of an audience, doubtless he will quote it as the speech of the honorable Senator from Connecticut; thus electioneering fables multiply and gather as they go. This so-called speech was made on the occasion referred to yesterday by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] He said of that night and its scenes what I should hesitate to say. Referring to a night and a day of filibustering in the Senate, to a scene unusually boisterous, he said that six or a dozen Senators who were most demonstrative were inspired. Perhaps they were—it may be so. It was one of the worst all-night sessions I remember; how far, or how many of the actors were inspired, how often they were inspired, by what kind and quantity they were inspired, I will not venture to say; the Senator from Ohio was sufficiently explicit. Passionate and unwarranted utterances vied with each other, and in the course of a long partisan speech read by Mr. Vickers he quoted the sensational newspaper paragraphs to which the Senate has now again listened.

Some of the persons named and characterized may have been appointed supervisors—the democratic party named one-half of the supervisors, and whether any of these men were selected by one side or the other I have no means at hand to ascertain.

Much has been said in the Senate of late about the doings and sayings of Mr. Davenport in New York. Indeed much has been said so full of swollen phrase and emphasis as to well deserve the name of rant, respecting prosecutions and arrests of alleged fraudulent voters in the city of New York.

In reply to this flood of talk, I have two things to say. John I. Davenport is a resident and a citizen of the State of New York, and the State of New York is able and ready to administer her own laws. She has courts, grand juries, prosecuting officers, and all the apparatus and machinery of justice. All this has been true in the city of New York ever since the yoke of Tweed and Tammany was broken. If John I. Davenport has maliciously prosecuted any man, if he has falsely imprisoned any man, if he has overpassed the law in any regard, John I. Davenport, like every other culprit, is amenable every day to prosecution, and prosecution may be instituted by any citizen, be he high or low, democrat or republican. Every individual in all the State has every day his day in court to apply for a warrant for the arrest of Davenport; whenever the grand jury is sitting, to go and make his complaint; and then, unless John I. Davenport has observed and kept the law in every particular, he will stand as naked and as liable to punishment as any other trespasser, any other law-breaker, any other man who has falsely imprisoned a citizen or who has employed the process of the court or of the law for purposes of oppression.

Has Davenport been prosecuted? Have any of these innocents whose treatment so exasperated the Senator from Ohio yesterday when he thought of it, many hundreds of whom have since as I am told come forward and declared their intentions, taken the first step to become citizens, and thus conclusively admitted the fraud and want of validity of the papers on which it has been boasted here they have for years and years been swelling democratic majorities—has any one of them, or the counsel by whom they have been represented and instructed, made complaint against John I. Davenport? If complaint has been made, or when complaint shall be made, we shall witness a judicial investigation of these charges; and when that investigation results in a conviction or in proof of the guilt of Davenport without a conviction, Senators will be warranted, as they are not now warranted, in some part of the wild roar of vituperation with which they strive to deafen the public ear.

Meanwhile, and as my second observation, let me turn to a congressional investigation conducted by one never known to belong to the republican party. He did not belong to the republican party when term after term he graced a seat in Congress from the great Commonwealth of Ohio; and, later on, when the restless foot of American adventure and freedom carried him suddenly to New York and brought him swiftly back as a Representative from there, still he was not a republican, and therefore not subject to the epithet of carpet-bagger.

He has always been a democrat, a modern democrat, with all the modern additions and improvements. He served, if I remember aright, many a year ago, before the war, in the House of Representatives with my honorable friend who now represents the State of Ohio here, [Mr. PENDLETON,] and who will confirm me when I say that Mr. SAMUEL S. COX has always been a democrat, never suspected of belonging to, or sympathizing with, the republican party.

On the 3d of March, 1877, long after all of the dates and all the doings to which the honorable Senator from Connecticut has referred, "Mr. COX, from the Select Committee on Alleged Fraudulent Registration and Fraudulent Voting in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, submitted the following report." I beg to read two or three passages from it:

Whatever may be said about the United States law as to elections or their supervision by United States authority; whatever may be said as to the right of a State to regulate in all ways such elections, this must be said, that the administration of the law by Commissioners Davenport, Muirhead, and Allen, the United States functionaries, and their subordinates, was eminently just and wise and conducive to a fair public expression in a presidential year of unusual excitement and great temptation. The testimony of Mr. Davenport, the United States commissioner for the southern district of New York, is a remarkable statement, which the committee would adopt as the basis of their report as to the three cities.

I read again:

A PATTERN FOR IMITATION.

The committee would commend to other portions of the country and to other cities this remarkable system, developed through the agency of both local and Federal authorities acting in harmony for an honest purpose. In no portion of the world, and in no era of time, where there has been an honest expression of the popular will through the forms of law, has there ever been a more complete and thorough illustration of republican institutions. Whatever may have been the previous habit or conduct of elections in those cities, or howsoever they may conduct themselves in the future, this election of 1876 will stand as a monument of what good faith, honest endeavor, legal forms, and just authority may do for the protection of the elective franchise.

Now, if my honorable friend from Connecticut believes all that at second and third hand he has been repeating, how like a passage from the Arabian Nights' Entertainment this orthodox democratic authority must sound. Should I take up, as I might, in detail the rascalities by which men in hundreds and in thousands were by fraud, perjury, and forgery clothed with the semblance of American citizenship, by which they tramped from poll to poll and voted under assumed names to the number of six, eight, ten, each in a single day; should I set forth all the deviltry which made the elections in the city of New York for years a wretched, guilty farce, and then recount the efforts made under national law to protect popular right, this language of the report would seem to fall short rather than to overstep the line of truthful narrative.

Mr. President, this is not the hustings; this is not a rostrum from which to treat at large of the politics of the State of New York. Let me say to the honorable Senator from Connecticut and to all others, however, that whenever they wish to come into the State of New York to discuss in the presence of her people the modes by which elections were long carried in their chief city, and the modes by which efforts have been made to put an end to abuses, they will find hospitable audience and they will find also sons of New York who will see that the truth and the fact is not forgotten or misstated.

Mr. VOORHEES. If it will not interfere with and be disagreeable to the Senator from New York, I desire——

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana would never be disagreeable to me.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is very kind in the Senator from New York. But the Senator from New York prefaced the remarks with which he just entertained the Senate by a statement, in which I certainly concur and I presume all other Senators do, that New York was quite able to take care of herself. The whole country recognizes that fact, that in the thirty-eight States of this Union New York stands at the head of the column; and yet before the Senator concluded he spoke of the miserable farces, the corrupt and degrading and disgraceful spectacles which elections in New York had presented to the world for years past. The Senator from New York is on this floor as the representative of a party in the majority in the State of New York. The Legislature which returned him to this body during the last winter had the power to make laws on this subject. The Legislature of the State of New York has had that power ever since she has been a State. Nobody will question, however we divide on other questions, that a State has the right to protect the purity of her ballot-box; and I desire to know why it is that the State of New York—I speak it with no disrespect to the Senator—is calumniated here by his statement that her elections have been a disgrace to the civilized world and dominated by thugs, assassins, murderers, and scoundrels of every degree? Why, has not the State of New York in her conceded legislative power passed laws to control the ballot-box and to put down the scoundrels that he says have dominated from the Park to the Battery? Why has not that been done? Is the State of New York so poor, so low in the scale of political Commonwealths that she has to come as an humble suppliant upon her knees to the Federal Government to endow John I. Davenport with the powers of an emperor over the rights and liberties of her people in order to get a pure election at her ballot-boxes? That is the question. It is the question that divides the two sides of this Chamber.

I insist upon pure elections; I insist upon fair elections; I denounce thugs and assassins; and the State from which I come can take care of that kind of people. The State from which the Senator from New York comes, however, comes as a suppliant to the throne of Federal power, asking us to protect them from their own bad citizens, when by their own constitution, by the structure of the Federal Government, by the power of the State of New York, and by its own conceded greatness they have all these questions in their own hands.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this outburst of rhetoric——

Mr. VOORHEES. No rhetoric.

Mr. CONKLING. From one of rhetoric's acknowledged masters, lacks but one quality essential to its merit, and that is originality. The honorable Senator from Indiana is gifted——

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg my friend's pardon.

Mr. CONKLING. I have heard the Senator, he will now hear me. His shower of fire-works has already so dazzled and dismayed me, that I will make answer before becoming blinded by still greater glare.

I was about to say that the honorable Senator from Indiana is endowed with so much vigor of imagination, his rhetorical pictures are usually so lurid, that he disparages and belittles himself when he takes up a faded piece of trumpery and produces it again as his own.

The Senator's suggestion is that I impugn the character and ability of the people of New York by referring to frauds practiced in elections, and by approving of national statutes to aid in preventing such frauds. Democratic newspapers had made this allegation stale before it was repeated the first time by a member of the Senate. Five Senators have in succession revamped it since, the last of the five being my colleague who, worn and soiled as it had become, and destitute of truth and sense as it was in the beginning, picked it up with avidity and brought it into the Senate again, apparently as much elated as if he had found something new or had originated something himself. This is not unnatural, but I confess my surprise that the Senator from Indiana should by appropriating so poor an expedient, used by so many before him, confess such poverty in controversy, such sterility in debate. Let me say to that honorable Senator that, responsible not to him but to the people who have honored and trusted me over much, whenever the State whose interests and honor are so dear to me shall be calumniated by word or deed of mine, I will bow in repentance and contrition before her offended majesty. Let me say to him further that the State of New York is not likely to need his services either to arraign the words or the votes of her Senator, or to vindicate her power, her authority, or her honor. I did not say that New York is able to take care of herself; I do say so now, however. I do say that she is able, as she has proved herself able, not only to take care of herself, but when need be to send more than five hundred thousand of her sons to take care of the whole Republic also. New York is able, were it her duty, to enforce within her borders the revenue and customs laws of the nation. Her citizens and her soldiers have might enough to enforce and execute all the national laws within her limits. But she does not feel affronted, she does not deem herself disparaged by the fact that this great volume of statutes of the nation [holding up the volume of Revised Statutes] has inscribed upon its pages the authority under which the national Army and the national posse may move within her borders to enforce the revenue laws. Loyal as she is, devoted as she is to a system of government under which has arisen a nationality incontestably the greatest and freest the world has ever seen, she is willing that its authority shall not only visit, but dwell, and be at home within her domain to exercise every right, and to wield every power expressed or implied by a Constitution which framed in wisdom, and preserved at vast cost, the people of New York hope to transmit as a beneficent and imperishable inheritance to their posterity.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana must allow me to proceed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator has ventured to say that which, notwithstanding a regard for him, uninterrupted during an acquaintance of twenty years, it required some forbearance patiently to hear—he has ventured to say that I have "calumniated" the State of New York; and thus summoned to my feet by such a charge I choose to dispose of it before pausing for other interruptions.

I say again that because of the true faith and allegiance which the State of New York bears to the Union, the Government and the Constitution of the United States, because of the understanding she has of her obligations and her interest as a member of the Union, she does not object to national authority abiding within her dominions to execute national laws.

National right in a State does not depend on the might or on the weakness of the particular State. The State of New York is strong enough to punish, she is no doubt able alone to punish all who utter, publish, or make false, forged, or counterfeit money in the similitude and likeness of the coin of the United States. She is strong enough, patriotic enough, wise enough to deal with counterfeiters, and she could do it without national aid; but she does not therefore object to the acts of Congress under which Federal courts take notice of such offenses, nor to the statutes under which the marshals of the United States summon the posse, armed or unarmed, in numbers more or less, to enforce the national authority. So in many other instances of national and of concurrent jurisdiction and right to which I might refer. The question in her estimation is not urgent whether New York is large enough and strong enough, to be uppish and pragmatic enough to cavil and bully and split hairs over the point whether one class or another class of resisters of the nation's laws could or could not be dealt with by State authority alone. Such questions are all set at rest the moment the test of the law is applied. Wherever the subject-matter is one to which the Constitution and laws of the United States extends, whether exclusively, or concurrently with the constitutions and laws of the several States, it is honest, patriotic and wise for every State to acknowledge and aid the national authority.

So, Mr. President, I did not by intention, nor by word, nor by appearance when seen by honest and intelligent eyes, even seem to calumniate the State of New York when I acknowledged my willingness as one of her citizens and my belief in her willingness to stand to and abide by the Constitution and its intendments. On the contrary it was encomium, it was eulogy, and only deserved eulogy of the State of New York and of her people to insist that they stand ready at all times to permit and assist the free workings of the National Constitution and laws.

It pleased the Senator from Indiana in his somewhat tangled question to ask how it came that in a State so powerful elections became for years a hissing and a by-word. The question is easy of answer, but it is unpleasant of answer. It is not agreeable needlessly to display on the national theater the wrongs, affronts and indignities inflicted year after year upon the people of a populous and powerful Commonwealth. Yet I will answer the Senator. It came because the party to which he belongs having gained possession of the political power and government of great cities, and at length of the State itself, having clutched the machinery by which elections are held, the managers and leaders so acted, so polluted and debauched every step in the elective process from naturalization and registration to the count and return of votes, that majorities were trodden under the heel of truculent usurped authority. It came because the democratic party, known in the eastern end of the State by the name of Tammany, was officered and engineered by a band of which Tweed was the bravest and Sweeny the craftiest—a band which wielding for years all the powers of the democratic party, and moulding the legislation of the State to assist their purposes, seized by the throat the greatest city in the western hemisphere and subjected it to the most colossal robbery of modern times. Twenty-three million dollars in a few months were stolen, and property and tax-payers were plundered and spoiled year after year, and the money divided in part among individuals to pile up huge private fortunes, and the residue used as a corruption fund in the presence of which the idea of a fair election and a fair count for a time vanished utterly. It happened because this junta made the judges of the courts on Manhattan Island, and the judges of the courts abused their powers on a scale and with a facile swiftness of industry which I might peril my reputation for veracity by reciting. What would Senators say should I state that for twenty consecutive days, on every day, in a single court, thirteen hundred and eleven persons were ostensibly naturalized? What would the Senate think were I to state that tens of thousands were turned out and turned loose as citizens at a rate which rendered it impossible to comply with one, even the briefest, of all the legal formalities required? Yet so it was. The judges did, and suffered and abetted all this, and more. The honorable Senator from Connecticut looked across the ages to find an example of a corrupt man who wore the ermine. Let me tell my honorable friend that examples, like charity, might well begin at home.

Mr. EATON. There are some of them here.

Mr. CONKLING. These officers were corrupt, and description would be beggared in attempting to recite the foul wrongs they did to stuff the ballot-box with fraudulent democratic votes, and to falsify the count with democratic results.

The same power made and corrupted the inspectors or judges of election, and when it was necessary in two counties to falsely add thirty thousand to the count, the thirty thousand was added between the going down of the sun and the rising of the same. When the occasion was critical, lightning carried over the wires to the corner men of the democratic party throughout the rural districts, directions the moment the polls closed to telegraph estimates "by captions," that is to guess by the color of the tickets, although pasters used upon them might vary definite results, to guess and estimate upon the color of the tickets, and telegraph instantly to headquarters in New York probable results, in the respective precincts; all to the end, as the world knows, that these party leaders in the city might see before certifying and publishing the result how many thousands and how many thousands more it was necessary to add in order that democracy might triumph.

I have heard it said that Mr. Tilden denied the authorship of such a dispatch sent in his name. Mr. President, there is no stress of occasion, I hope, which would lead me to do injustice to a man because he is a political opponent, and I gladly tarry a moment to bear witness that Mr. Tilden did, and did soon afterward deny, and, as I understand, has ever since denied that he sent or authorized the dispatch. So be it. It only speaks more loudly of the brazen audacity of men who, in an enterprise so foul, did not shrink from carrying it on by forging the name of the chairman of the democratic State committee. The telegraph did its work, forgery or no forgery, all the same. "The faithful" everywhere from the river to the lakes obeyed the mandate; they sent the probable results, and when those results were totalized, the managers of the democracy in New York and Brooklyn knew instantly the measure of the forgery they would commit.

In such ways, it happened that elections in the city of New York became the prey, the sport, and the spoil of corrupt scoundrels who managed the democratic party, and who continued to manage it till exposed and driven from power by the republican party, aided by individual democrats, and aided still more by the election law which the united democracy in both Houses is striving to break down.

Perhaps I have now been sufficiently explicit to gratify the curiosity of the Senator from Indiana as to how it was and how it could be that elections were so suffocated in fraud. Suffice it to add that all that false registration, false naturalization, repeating, ballot-box-stuffing, false counting, forgery, and perjury could do, as far as they were necessary, was done not one year, not two years, not three years, but in repeated years to belie and vitiate elections in the city of New York. Very likely, more than likely, in a match of numbers and of power, the State of New York might, unaided by national law or authority, have achieved the task of putting an end to all this. There were, however, great difficulties in the way, because no matter what the majority was in portions of the State in which the elections were fairly held, that majority was swamped and borne down in the city of New York and the question was how to dislodge the men thus intrenched—how to get the election machinery out of their hands.

It so occurred—the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] thought yesterday because of some vigilance of the Union League Club—that a national election law was enacted and came to aid us in the time of need. When I listened to the eminent Senator as he wearied himself in trying to ascertain who suggested the election law he is working so hard to destroy, I was reminded of a like effort often seen in courts of justice. It constantly occurs that culprits caught and indicted wonder and labor to find out who set the prosecution on foot, and charge it upon some one who would seem to be interested.

It is not useful on the trial of an indictment to find out who started the accusation; the weightier matter is whether it be true. So I can hardly understand the value of an inquiry who first suggested the national election law. Whoever first thought of it, this national act came into being despite the most desperate democratic opposition, it has run the gauntlet of the courts, it has done great good, checked great harm, and in its administration received the democratic encomiums I have read from Mr. COX and his committee.

Legislation and administration in New York have of course adapted and adjusted themselves more or less to the national statute, and utilized it. What might have been accomplished without it is hardly worth speculating about, because we have had it and have not been driven to inquire what or how we could do or could have done without it.

Now, having turned aside upon an abrupt and unexpected summons, I will proceed with what I rose to say.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut reeled off his legal and historical dissertation touching juries until it seemed to me that he was somewhat lost in the mazes of metaphorical confusion. He began by denouncing the sections which this bill aims to repeal, and preserving great evenness of gait and a high rate of speed he soon reached the point at which it became pertinent to declare that juries are packed, and that he and those with him have in the pending bill a measure to establish a general uniform system of drawing juries, to prevent the packing of juries, and to secure that impartial trial by jury for which one might almost infer my honorable friend had fought, and bled, and died in at least three wars.

Now, I want to put on the record in the hope that it may go out and be read by the discerning people of the country a brief legislative history of juries and their selection in courts of the United States. I want to present the sections of the statutes as they stand, with their dates.

Let me premise by saying that at the very beginning of the Government a statute was enacted committing to the clerks of the courts the duty of drawing jurors. That was in 1789, and it was to be done in the modes practiced in the several States. In 1802 that duty was in respect of special juries transferred to the marshals. In 1840 it was provided that the drawing should be in each State according to the laws and usages of that State, and there the matter stands to this day, excepting only certain provisions asked for at particular times by particular States—provisions applicable only to them, and of which nobody complains.

Here is the act of 1789:

And jurors in all cases to serve in the courts of the United States shall be designated by lot or otherwise in each State respectively according to the mode of forming juries therein now practiced, so far as the laws of the same shall render such designation practicable by the courts or marshals of the United States; and the jurors shall have the same qualifications as are requisite for jurors by the laws of the State of which they are citizens, to serve in the highest courts of law of such State, and shall be returned as there shall be occasion for them, from such parts of the district from time to time as the court shall direct, so as shall be most favorable to an impartial trial, and so as not to incur an unnecessary expense, or unduly to burden the citizens of any part of the district with such services. And writs of venire facias when directed by the court shall issue from the clerk's office, and shall be served and returned by the marshal in his proper person, or by his deputy, or in case the marshal or his deputy is not an indifferent person, or is interested in the event of the cause, by such fit person as the court shall specially appoint for that purpose, to whom they shall administer an oath or affirmation that he will truly and impartially serve and return such writ. And when from challenges or otherwise there shall not be a jury to determine any civil or criminal cause, the marshal or his deputy shall, by order of the court where such defect of jurors shall happen, return jurymen de talibus circumstantibus sufficient to complete the panel; and when the marshal or his deputy are disqualified as aforesaid, jurors may be returned by such disinterested person as the court shall appoint.

The next act was in 1802:

That from and after the passing of this act, no special juries shall be returned by the clerks of any of the said circuit courts; but that in all cases in which it was the duty of the said clerks to return special juries before the passing of this act, it shall be the duty of the marshal for the district where such circuit court may be held, to return special juries, in the same manner and form, as, by the laws of the respective States, the said clerks were required to return the same.

Then came a long interval of legislation, and in 1840 Congress adopted this act; and I beg the honorable Senator from Connecticut to do me the favor to listen to it:

That jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, in each State respectively—

Not in Connecticut, but—in each State respectively, shall have the like qualifications, and be entitled to the like exemptions, as jurors of the highest court of law of such State now have and are entitled to, and shall hereafter from time to time have and be entitled to, and shall be designated by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming such juries now practiced and hereafter to be practiced therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States, or the officers thereof; and for this purpose the said courts shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impaneling of juries, in substance, to the laws and usages now in force in such State; and further, shall have power, by rule or order, from time to time, to conform the same to any change in these respects which may be hereafter adopted by the Legislatures of the respective States for the State courts.

That section, carried into the Revised Statutes stands as section 800. Now what does my honorable friend from Connecticut say? First he wants a uniform system. Does he? He a State-rights man with a statute which now requires that in every State jurors shall have the qualifications and be drawn according to the laws and usages of that State,—does he want a uniform system by national law? What has so suddenly become of the State-rights argument he spent the morning in building up and propping with the sayings of other men? Can it be that the State-rights man of State-rights men wants a jury system uniform in every State, a Procrustean, absolute, cast-iron system, to operate in every State from Maine to the Gulf and from the Gulf to Oregon!

"Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askalon" that the great apostle of State rights, he who like Saul among the Hebrews towers in shape and gesture proudly eminent among the advocates of the rights of the States, wants to obliterate State lines, with the great smoothing-iron of congressional power.

But, suppose he does want a national system, a uniform system, will he get it by striking down one section, and that the only section under which the Chief-Justice, with his fan in his hand, may now separate the wheat from the chaff in the jury-box of South Carolina? Can the repeal of that section make the jury system uniform? Not at all, because here still remains the act of 1840, the act that utters—the only act that now utters the voice of the National Legislature. So that the honorable Senator if he wants a uniform system and votes for this bill to get it, will be like the celebrated engineer, hoist by his own petard.

But he says marshals pack juries. Do they? Would the pending repeal remedy that? Who are these marshals who pack juries? When we had a marshal sent here for the State of Georgia, for example, championed by both the Senators from that State, he had certificates, relationship, and antecedents which seemed a bond of fate against his ever packing a jury in the interest of a republican. When a district attorney came here for South Carolina heralded in advance by the governor of South Carolina now a member of this body, telegraphing from Chattanooga or somewhere in the far West that Mr. Northrup was to be appointed district attorney, there seemed promise of a prosecuting officer not likely to rise in open court and move that oaths should be administered to democrats to exclude them. It is marvelous, to be sure, that the Chief-Justice, a citizen of Toledo in the State of Ohio, should have known the political preferences, as he must have done according to a statement made to us to-day, of the men in South Carolina who were drawn to serve as jurors. If he was instructed by the public prosecutor who under the statute must make the motion to require a juror to swear to his loyalty or stand aside, it was still more remarkable that this particular district attorney, anointed with the oil of democratic approval, brought forward under the auspices of the democratic governor, announced by telegraph across half a continent in advance as the successful man—it is remarkable overmuch that this prosecutor bent his bow and made democrats a mark for his arrow. I am inclined to think that there is some portion of that narrative which has not reached us.

But if a marshal packs a jury, he is indictable, he is impeachable, he is removable; and even if he were not, the section at which this repeal is aimed has no more to do with the power of the marshal to pack a jury and no more to do with preventing his packing a jury, than it has to do with the Westminster catechism or the five points of Calvin. Yet there is sent out with the weight of the name of the Senator from Connecticut behind it the announcement that in this appropriation bill are provisions really designed to prevent packing juries, and to secure fair and impartial trials. No such thing is true. The real purpose is wholly different. Should these repealing provisions become law the whole jury system will stand exactly as it does now save and except one thing only. What is that? When next the Chief-Justice goes to South Carolina to preside at the trial of night-riders, kuklux, incendiaries, murderers, assassins, he will miss from the statute-book a section, the only one under which he might inquire whether these alleged acts were political in their animus; if political, whether they came from the act or indictment of those still moved by the spirit and hatred of the rebellion and its belongings; the only statute under which in a case of which there are many he would have power to determine whether the prisoner at the bar should be tried before a jury of men actually or virtually particips criminis. Towering declamation about the sacred right of trial by jury, rodomontade about English-speaking men and Anglo-Saxon superiority may deceive those who do not take the trouble to look into these statutes. Such glamour can deceive nobody else, save only those who are willfully blind.

Show me, Mr. President, an instance of a religious war—and the wars of religion have been the most bitter which have stirred mankind—show me an instance of a religious war, particularly one waged by combatants residing before and afterwards in the same country, and I will show you an instance in which without some special safeguards it was long impossible to secure fair and impartial juries in cases reviving the feeling or provocation of the war. That black drop locked up in the human heart, that drop which no human eye can see called motive—motive comes in and prejudice growing out of past occurrences and past grudges and tendencies gendered often long before; and unless you have some method of instituting such imperfect investigations as human faculties may conduct, the broad chance is that, instead of finding impartial and unbiased triers in the jury-box, you find those inspired by prejudice or passion.

It was Burke I believe who said that the great object of all government was to get twelve honest men into the jury-box. He never said, he never thought, no student of human nature, no philosopher ever concluded that the object could be attained without searching, discriminating, efficient modes of distinguishing between man and man in the composition of a jury.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me a few moments?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say just one word, and then I will yield to the Senator from New York. In the face of very great temptation, and with a desire to say much in reply to this extraordinary speech of an hour's duration, and with a reservation of some other period upon this question, I feel it my duty to yield to the Senator from New York on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Indiana for yielding the floor to me.

Mr. President, I wish to make a few observations in reference to the city of New York and the people who live there. The people of the city of New York constitute nearly a quarter of the five million people of that State. The character of the people of New York City is important to the State both as a matter of pride and as a matter of interest; and it is important to the commercial world who have so much of property there and so many of whom sojourn there from time to time and have to rely mainly for protection for life and property upon the municipal authorities and government of that city. From questions which have been put by some and remarks which have been made by others in this Chamber it would appear to a stranger that the people of that city—more than a million—are not able to govern themselves; that they are not able to protect life and property and the rights of their citizens; that life is not safe and good order is not preserved in that city.

Sir, I wish to say on behalf of the people of the city of New York that they are able to govern property in that great commercial city where property by the million belonging to those who live elsewhere is constantly sent to market or is in transit to market. All this must rely mainly for protection on the municipal government of the city; and this government is based upon and controlled by the electors, the citizens of that city. I assert that they are able and willing and do take care of that city. Look at that people and their conduct. Their character is known certainly all over the Union and throughout the civilized and commercial world. They are intelligent, virtuous, and energetic. It is a city studded with churches and with charitable and benevolent institutions supported by the people of that city themselves.

I need spend no time upon this point. I cannot believe that any Senator or that any one having general information about that city doubts that the city of New York is filled, not with ruffians and tramps as some inquiries which have been put would indicate, but by a people of courage, intelligence, manliness, and self-control, with all the capabilities and ability to control themselves and others which constitute a community who can take care of a great city in a free republic controlled by free men.

I admit what I believe to be true, that there can be thrown at that city by those who think it right to do so the fact that there were great abuses for a few years in its municipal government. I will not be tempted to make this a party discussion. Tammany Hall did not make Tweed and his associates. These men were in politics and got control of Tammany Hall, and they got laws through the Legislature—passed by republican legislators—by which they were enabled to dominate over their own party in that city for a time and to rob and wrong the people. This continued only for a short period. When the people of that city were aroused by the disclosures in 1871 of peculation and corruption they overthrew Tweed and his associates. Their rule was ended. Many a man said when he saw what was done that his faith was strengthened in republican government by what the people of the city of New York did in promptly overthrowing peaceably maladministration and restoring honest government. The democrats of the city and State promptly drove Tweed and his corrupt associates who were plundering that people from power and restored purity and honest government. It made every man within the State and city feel that whenever the people realized that their government was in danger from corrupt politicians the mass of that party to which such politicians belonged would rise up and shake them off. The democracy of the city of New York did this.

Our judiciary was not all corrupt in the city even at that time, thank God; but there were two or three judges only who had become the tools and creatures of designing men. What happened? The democrats overthrew Tweed. Honored and honest men were asked to and did become directors and trustees of that organization, namely, Tammany Hall. The democratic party not only turned Tweed out of power in the city but out of all power in the State, where he was acting, it was said, and as I believe truly, with men of the other party who had been too ready and willing to aid him in his corrupt schemes for several years in the Legislature. Although reproach was for a time brought by the conduct of Tweed and his clique upon the democracy of New York, yet no party ever enjoyed a day of more real respect and honor among the people who knew the facts than the democratic party of that city and State when they overthrew the men who were plundering its people under the pretense of governing them—when the democracy preferred to be beaten rather than to hold power with the aid of Tweed and his corrupt associates.

What happened to those corrupt judges of the city of New York? Proceedings were instituted. Mr. Tilden was sent to the Legislature himself, being one of the men who was active in the movement against Tweed, and they framed laws that were needed, and one judge resigned to escape impeachment and one was impeached and convicted, having the courage, if not the innocence, which made him stand a trial. Another judge was about to be removed under proceedings before the governor, and he resigned and avoided them. Thus the judiciary of the city was purified, a judiciary having at all times a great number of men in it of purity and learning, who were honest, just judges.

But there were these three judges I admit who were said to be used, and it was said truly, as it was disclosed that they were used under the forms of law to rob large corporations and do injustice as between man and man and perhaps to grant naturalizations illegally. A city that can purify itself, a party governing that city that will purify itself from such men, that people and that party may be safely trusted to manage properly the municipal affairs of the great city of New York—a city of which I am justly proud, a city from which I dwell far away, but whose people are well known. Who is there in these seats who does not respect them? Whether the cry of distress comes from the North or the South, from the East or the West, or from other countries, where some calamity has fallen upon the people and they are needy and suffering, when was it that the people of the city of New York did not gather in their churches and in their exchanges and in their marts of commerce and send out speedy and cheerful and generous relief? Are they a people who are not to be esteemed as honest and just? Are they or any large controlling body of them to be stigmatized justly as ruffians and law-breakers, or as unable or unwilling to carry on local self-government under the law and according to law?

I doubt not there were frauds in naturalization in New York City. I have no personal knowledge on the subject, and I need not and will not attempt to enter into any discussion of this. But this I assert, the mass of the democratic party of that great city which has governed it did not wish these frauds; they were opposed to them. Corrupt men had power there for a few years and they wanted the frauds; but when the frauds were disclosed those men were overthrown. At every honest, fair election which has been held in the city of New York, and when the democratic party has been united, New York City has been very largely democratic. While I admit that there have been peculations by those who governed for a time, who were overthrown in the way that I have referred to, and while I cannot deny that there were frauds in some elections, nevertheless what does the very report from which we have heard extracts read prove? It proves that on a fair, honest vote New York City is democratic. I have here the report of the Cox committee in reference to the election of 1876, when party feeling ran high; I mean in the sense of each party exerting itself. Mr. Davenport was examined. Although I have not read his evidence fully myself, yet the committee refer to it, and he and they all say that the election of 1876 was one of the most honest and fair and peaceable elections ever held in that city. What was the result?

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

Mr. KERNAN. I cannot state it with accuracy.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

Mr. KERNAN. Just wait a moment. The result was that the city of New York gave a very large democratic majority at that honest, fair, and peaceable election in 1876. Some one I asked yesterday said the majority was fifty-odd thousand. I believe this is correct, although I have not the figures. It was largely democratic. This proves that the democracy of New York City do not require fraud or fraudulent votes to carry largely the city.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator if he will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to read a little from the report which I heard my friend from Minnesota read from the other day.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator declines to yield for a question with reference to this point?

Mr. KERNAN. For a question I decline to yield at this moment; but when I get through with the short statement I am making, if gentlemen will be kind enough to sit here at this late hour and let me make it, I will answer the questions put, if I can.

New York is a democratic city, and you know at all strongly contested elections when the minority party is beaten they are very apt to make strong charges and complaints against their opponents. There may have been occasionally ground for them; but notwithstanding any charge that is made it cannot be denied that on a fair vote in 1874, 1875, 1876, and 1877, a large majority of the voters of that city did vote the democratic ticket. We were beaten last fall because there were divisions in the party, and I have nothing to say about them. The democratic party does not need fraud or force or any illegitimate means to have a very large democratic majority in the city of New York. I wish to read from this same report read from by the Senator from Minnesota and my colleague, which I had never read until the Senator from Minnesota the other day called my attention to it on this floor. The committee say in other parts of the report that it was a fair, peaceable, and honest election, free from intimidation and obstruction of voters on the one side and free from fraud or from false voting on the other.

Mr. ALLISON. What becomes, then, of all these charges against Davenport?

Mr. KERNAN. I am going to tell my friend. Perhaps the Senator had better read this report. I allude to this report in reference to the election of 1876 to prove that there should not be, that it is not necessary that this arbitrary power given by these United States election laws should exist, but that the citizens will manage their elections and will give us honest elections in New York City and elsewhere. Why do I say so? First I will read what the committee find. They compliment Mr. Davenport for aiding, in 1876, the local authorities; but he would not do the same last year. I read from page 3 of the report of the committee as to the election of 1876:

The United States commissioner, along with the mayor of the city and the president of the board of police, General Smith, had a meeting to allay any excitement occasioned by rumors which always precede an election. The United States marshal, district attorney, and the counsel of the corporation of New York were called in. They were men of various politics. They came to an agreement, which was signed, so as to execute the law without straining it, and so as to adjudicate without irritation or impediment the questions which might arise during the day of election. Throughout the whole length of New York, sixteen and a quarter miles, arrangements were made to prevent bringing men any distance from their homes or the polling place. The commissioners were distributed over the city, and from early morning until after the polls closed cases were taken before them and information given by them as to voting. Four lawyers were selected, General Barlow, Mr. Alderman Billings, Mr. Marbury, and Mr. Olney. They, too, were equally divided as to politics, and the rule was adopted that whenever they found a reasonable and well-founded doubt as to a person being a legal voter, the voter should get the benefit of the doubt, so that he could take an oath under challenge, and have applied to him by the inspectors the test of the law. It was intended to provide not only against fraudulent votes, but that no person really entitled to a vote should be refused. The political organizations concurred with Mr. Davenport in this arrangement. It proved a decided success, and the result was, what all who have any knowledge of this New York election have concurred in confirming, that there was comparatively no fraud, and the attempts made to repress it were welcomed by both parties and carried out in good faith.

They had an honest, fair election in 1876. Mr. Davenport did not attempt to put in force the unfair practices which he put in force in 1878, outraging and wronging large numbers of citizens.

The mayor of the city of New York was a democrat and General Smith, the president of the board of police, was, I believe, a democrat, and that was a board made up of both parties. The rumors were to the effect that there was to be obstruction to voting and arbitrary arrests on election day. The counsel of the corporation of New York was a democrat who was called in by these citizens of both parties, who said that there were rumors that there would be arrests under the United States laws and there was alarm and excitement about the election. They were men of different politics, and they had a meeting. They made arrangements to watch and scrutinize and adjudicate upon every case without unnecessary impediment to or detention of the honest men who might be suspected and arrested, and whom, last year when they wished to give bail, they took from Harlem, or wherever it was, down to the post-office, and then would only let them give bail and be discharged on their promise not to vote. This report sets forth that in 1876 they did what I have always urged, whether there was a United States law or whether there was not, that fair, just electors on each side should be at the polls to allay excitement and counsel good order, and that they should warn a man by challenge and not arrest him without process, and if he was not entitled to vote and took the oath required after challenge, then they could present him to the grand jury and let him be punished if guilty. This is the proper way to prevent fraud in a land of liberty and law. That is what they did in New York at the election in 1876. All agree it was a peaceable, honest election, and the committee report that of the three hundred arrests made 90 per cent. of them were allowed to vote after examination. This was Mr. Davenport's own evidence. It was not so last year. He took a very different course then, which was apparently intended to obstruct and harass and intimidate voters.

Now, sir, from these facts it will be seen that New York City is a democratic city with an honest, peaceable election; that its government was got under the control of Tweed and his associates at one time, and many of the associates were of the other political party, and they all shared the plunder. They did plunder the city; but when the disclosures were made in 1871 the people of that city, the democrats of that city, rose up and in a day, I might almost say, overthrew fraud and peculation and restored good honest government to the city. The democrats themselves, with the approval and with the aid I dare say of many of their fellow-citizens, overthrew that man who had been plundering the city and the people who had intrusted to him power, intending he should govern the city honestly.

I do not feel called upon, I do not think it is fit or proper in this body when discussions arise upon important questions to occupy the time of the Senate in defending at any considerable length the democratic party of the city or the State of New York. I may say, as I believe it to be true as any word I could utter, that the great mass of that party in the city and in the State are honest, patriotic, intelligent American citizens, proud of their city and State, and desirous above all things to preserve a free government under which that city has grown up, and under which the people of that city have and can govern themselves wisely and well. There will be abuses, I admit there have been abuses in the past; I regret that they ever occurred, and I feel humiliation whenever they are alluded to, because the fact will be used to throw reproach upon the great city of our country, governed by its own people, by making it appear as though that people were not fit or competent to govern themselves. This charge is not true.

Sir, I repeat, I believe as to the people of either party, whenever the large controlling mass of either ceases to have virtue and integrity and courage to maintain their rights and maintain local self-government our system of free government must, will fail. All the governments we have got, of States, of cities, of villages, of counties, whereby the people control and regulate their own local affairs, are based upon the idea that the people are intelligent and honest and can and will manage their local matters better than the Federal Government can or will; therefore, while there are ruffians in both parties, while there are bad men in both parties, who through party politics seek to get control so as to wrong the industrious citizen through unfair and unjust taxation and plundering under the forms of law, yet I say it with pride, I say it with confidence—I leave it to the people of both parties in that great city whether I do not say truly—that while it is a democratic city, while there have been democratic rogues and scoundrels who wronged the people when in office, nevertheless the mass of each party are honest and patriotic, their interests are large in that city, and they will have honest voting and honest counting and peaceable elections for the sake of themselves, as well as for the sake of the institutions of this country. Any one who believes the contrary from the clamor that is sometimes made in the partisan press on the one side or the other, in heated political contests, is mistaken. The man who has the conviction or impression that the mass of the people of the city of New York have not the virtue, the courage, the intelligence, the religious principles that will secure them honest voting, honest counting, the protection of all men in life, liberty, and property, labors under a mistake, and I ask him to go to New York and become familiar with its people and judge for himself.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday, if I have the assent of the Senator from Kentucky in charge of the bill.

Mr. BECK. We are extremely anxious to proceed with this bill, and as there are several Senators who I understand still further desire to discuss these so-called political measures, I hope the Senate will not adjourn until Monday, and we shall perhaps be able to get through with the amendments to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Cannot there be an understanding?

Mr. BECK. If I may be allowed to say one word further, while I do not propose to indicate a time when we shall endeavor to force a vote, we expect to be able to reach a vote on Monday afternoon, or on Tuesday at the farthest; and if we do not meet to-morrow that would be impossible, as several Senators desire to address the Senate at length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Chair understands the Senator from Iowa to move that the Senate adjourn until Monday.

Mr. KERNAN and others. Oh, let us meet to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. If any Senator desires to speak to-morrow I will modify my motion to a motion simply to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let me say a word. There are a great many amendments here apart from these political questions, ten or fifteen or twenty amendments, and they may occupy all the time to-morrow. Cannot there be an understanding that there will be no political discussion to-morrow?

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to occupy a very short time on the political bearings of the bill, and I should like to take the floor now if the Senate is going to adjourn over, although I shall not be prepared to go on to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will move to adjourn over until Monday, to test the sense of the Senate. Of course if Senators think otherwise they will vote down the motion.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me to offer a resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. BRUCE submitted the following resolutions; which were read:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company appointed by resolution of the Senate of April 7, 1879, is authorized and directed to investigate the affairs of said savings and trust company and its several branches, to ascertain and report to the Senate all matters relating to the management of the same and the cause or causes of failure, with such other facts relating thereto as may be important to a full understanding of the management and present condition of the institution and to a more economical administration and speedy adjustment of its affairs.

Be it further resolved, That said committee, and any sub-committee thereof, shall be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, and be empowered to send for persons and papers, to summon witnesses, to administer oaths, and shall be anthorized to employ a stenographer and such other experts, accountants, and other assistants as may be necessary; and that the said committee be authorized to have printed, from time to time, for the use of the committee and the Senate all the testimony taken by them, together with the papers laid before it.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not object, but I want information. As I understood the previous resolution it authorized the employment of such force as was necessary. I ask the Senator from Mississippi whether the original resolution did not authorize the employment of a stenographer, clerk, &c.? I do not want a double set of officers.

Mr. BRUCE. The original resolution authorized the committee to employ a clerk, and nothing more.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not a stenographer?

Mr. BRUCE. No, sir; nothing more than a clerk, nor did it authorize the committee to administer oaths or to sit during the recess, which I believe is very proper.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I supposed the committee had authority to do that under the original resolution. If that is not so, I have no objection, however, to these resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolutions? The Chair hears none.

The resolutions were agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say only this, that if the Senate will agree to meet to-morrow and have no political discussion, I believe we can pass upon every amendment to be offered to the bill, and Senators can speak to the political features, as they are called, on Monday morning, and perhaps by four or five o'clock on Monday we shall be able to pass the bill, or on Tuesday certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I will modify my motion and move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BECK. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I am just informed, is compelled to be absent to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; then I shall insist on my original motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask both my colleagues on the committee to hear me a minute after what has been said. I have no preference as to whether the Senate meets to-morrow or not, but I simply submitted to my colleagues on the committee the fact that I should like to be present when the amendments to be offered to the bill are considered, and that I could not be present to-morrow; but if the general discussion is to go on I hope we shall meet to-morrow. I submit to the Senate the whole question.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say only one other word after what the Senator from West Virginia has said. I have been advised by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] and advised as to the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] that none of them wish to speak before Monday; and, therefore, if the Senator from West Virginia, who is chairman of the committee, objects to going on with the business part of the bill to-morrow, I am willing to adjourn over.

Mr. ALLISON. I think we had better adjourn until Monday.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not object to sitting to-morrow, but I submitted to my colleagues on the committee that I should like to be present when the amendments to be proposed are acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 15, noes 23.

Mr. EATON. I move that we adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us sit it out.

Mr. EATON. I have no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the better way.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Is the Senate ready for the question? ["No." "No."]

Mr. THURMAN. I think that no more reasonable or fair proposition could have been suggested than that of the Senator from Kentucky. We all know there is to be further debate on what are called, in my judgment very erroneously, the political provisions in this bill. As we know, that is all; those are the only parts of the bill that give rise to debate. The rest of the bill is mere matter of business. Let us meet to-morrow and let us dispose of the matters that do not touch these contested questions; let us postpone all these speeches on what are called the political provisions of the bill, as I said very erroneously so called, until Monday; let us meet to-morrow and go on like practical business men, as the Senator from Kentucky has suggested, with the other provisions of the bill. By unanimous consent, with the understanding among us all, we can postpone all speeches that have reference to the policy of the country until Monday, and we can go on to-morrow and decide those questions that have relation to the details of the bill. I hope, therefore, that a vote will be taken and we shall hold a session to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the honorable Senator from Ohio did not hear the statement of the Senator from West Virginia, the chairman of the committee. He stated to us that he was compelled to be absent to-morrow and he desired to be present when some of these amendments were considered.

Mr. EATON. Then let the political speeches be made to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. It was also understood that the gentlemen who desired to make political speeches were not ready to go on to-morrow; and therefore it was that I moved to adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will yield to me for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina withdraw the motion at the instance of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BUTLER. Let the honorable Senator indicate his object.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, after the morning hour, I shall move for an executive session for the consideration of a question which Senators generally know ought to be considered.

Mr. BUTLER. I now renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from South Carolina that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 16, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Friday, the first business in order is the unfinished business coming over from Friday last, being the joint resolution (H. R. No. 62) reported from the Committee of Accounts, fixing the date on which the payment of the committee clerks and pages of the House of Representatives, who are paid during the session only, shall begin for this session. An amendment was moved by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] and accepted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BOYD,] and then the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] moved to recommit the whole subject to the Committee of Accounts. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. STEPHENS. As the House is now quite thin, before the morning hour begins I ask leave to submit some reports from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that will be done. The joint resolution referred to by the Chair is one in which members are much interested.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of members to be present.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask leave to submit these reports from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the reports will be received, and the morning hour will not begin for the present.

There was no objection.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. STEPHENS, from the Committee on Rules, reported back, with the unanimous recommendation that the same be not agreed to, the following resolution:

Resolved, That Rule 134 be so amended as to allow clerks of House committees on the floor of the House during its sessions: Provided, however, That the Speaker shall, in his discretion, issue cards of admission to said clerks upon application from the chairmen of their respective committees.

The report of the committee was agreed to; and the resolution was accordingly laid upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING.

Mr. STEPHENS, from the same committee, submitted the following unanimous report:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mines and Mining be increased from eleven to thirteen members.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF RIVER AND HARBOR BILLS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to move that the rules be so amended that bills for improvement of rivers and harbors be referred at the Clerk's desk the same as post-route bills are now under the amended rules. The committee are unanimous on that, and I will only make a single statement. Every bill which passes in relation to the improvement of rivers and harbors contains all the items which the House are willing to agree to on that subject. The day we introduced so many bills here, a few weeks ago, there were ninety bills introduced for the improvement of this, that, or the other river and harbor, and of course there were 1,500 copies of each of those bills printed, which would make 135,000 copies of bills printed not one of which would ever be reported back as a separate bill to the House, but would all be consolidated in one river and harbor bill.

Mr. SPARKS. That amendment to the rules is right.

Mr. GARFIELD. This change in the rules will save all that printing. The bills will go to the Committee on Commerce and be consolidated. I presume there is no objection to the amendment to the rules.

Mr. REAGAN. Practically there is no real advantage gained by the introduction of these separate bills at all, and I think, therefore, it is entirely proper this report should be adopted. I will state that when a river and harbor bill is made here it is always made up from the Engineer Bureau giving the surveys and estimates of expense which are acted on by the committee, and I presume the introduction of these bills is simply to give emphasis to the wish of members on particular subjects. The introduction of these separate bills serves no practical purpose.

Mr. KENNA. I wish to ascertain the force of the amendment of the rules before voting on it. I understand it affects merely the question of printing?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the only object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio states that it would save the printing of one hundred and thirty-five thousand copies of bills in a single day.

The amendment to the rules was adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALCOHOLIC TRAFFIC, ETC.

Mr. FRYE. I have been directed by the Committee on Rules to submit the following report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed by the Speaker, to whom shall be referred all petitions, memorials, bills, and resolutions touching the "alcoholic traffic," a commission on the same, any amendments to the Constitution limiting or controlling the importation, manufacture, or sale of the same, whose duty it shall be to consider and report thereupon.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I should like to have the gentleman from Maine give us some explanation of that resolution before we are called to vote upon it. Is it the design of this resolution to create a committee to whom shall be referred questions now regularly before any standing committee of the House. Let us know exactly what is the purpose of this amendment to the rules.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. These reports from the Committee on Rules have come in by consent.

Mr. SPARKS. Is this a report from the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. It is the report of a majority of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest that the report be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It seems to me to be all wrong.

Mr. REAGAN. If the object be to look into the question of revenue derived by the Government from the sale of alcoholic liquors, then it should go to the Committee of Ways and Means. If the object is to go into an investigation as to the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors, although we might deprecate the extent to which that goes, I apprehend it would be a long way for this House to go in assuming jurisdiction over a subject in reference to which I understand by the Constitution we have no control. The Federal Government has control so far as the collection of revenue from the sale of liquor is concerned, but if it is claimed there is jurisdiction beyond that over this subject I should like to know where it comes from. I do not desire to see the House commit itself formally by raising a committee to do things which it is not authorized by the Constitution of the United States to do, and unless there can be some explanation made showing the authority of Congress over the subject I shall certainly wish to see that resolution defeated.

Mr. FRYE. Does the gentleman from New York desire to ask a question or make a remark?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I should like to have an explanation as to what the resolution means. Nobody here can understand it.

Mr. FRYE. I will endeavor to explain it.

Mr. KENNA. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. FRYE. Now, Mr. Speaker, the House is perfectly well aware that for the last six years there have been at each session of Congress more than five hundred thousand petitioners presenting to the Congress of the United States a request for legislation in relation to the sale of alcoholic liquors and especially for the appointment of a commission to investigate that subject and report upon it. The House is also aware that the Senate has twice passed, after discussion, a bill touching this same subject, which bill has been referred by the House to the Judiciary Committee. It is also known to the House that at one session of Congress large numbers of these petitions were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means on the ground that they touched the question of taxation. The House is also aware that no report was ever made upon this subject by the Committee of Ways and Means; that no investigation was had by them, and that by general consent all petitions of this character presented subsequently to that reference, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to which committee, as members well know, all these petitions have for three Congresses been referred. As a member of the Judiciary Committee it is within my knowledge that the subject has received no consideration whatever—to the extent even of one minute of time—by that committee.

I say, sir, that these petitioners have a right to be heard. They have a right to present their case to a committee of this House. They are entitled to receive consideration of their requests at the hands of Congress; and having failed in three Congresses to receive any fair degree of attention this House should not disregard their wishes.

Mr. KNOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the Committee on the Judiciary did hear elaborate arguments on this subject, extending over two or three days, during the last Congress.

Mr. FRYE. I am well aware that some ladies appeared and made arguments before the Judiciary Committee in relation to this subject, which was brought to the attention of the committee by at least five hundred thousand petitioners. I am aware further, as is the honorable chairman of the committee, that this subject was never heard of afterward in the committee. The gentleman knows that again and again I tried to have the matter brought up and a decision arrived at, so that if the majority report should be against the prayer of the petitioners, there might be opportunity for a minority report, and thus both sides of the question be brought to the attention of the House. I was never able to succeed in getting any action in the committee on the subject. Now these people have become wearied with presenting petitions which receive no consideration. The people who believe in temperance represent certainly a respectable element in this country; and I do not believe any gentleman on this floor would be opposed to any movement which would have a tendency temperance-ward. The only difference of opinion is as to what will create that tendency.

Now these people are asking for a commission of investigation, the appointment of which will not be expensive and surely can do no harm. My impression is that the bill on this subject provided that the expense should be paid by the friends of the measure. All that they ask is that the subject of this traffic shall be thoroughly investigated in behalf of the nation, as you examine into the yellow fever, or the cattle disease, or anything that is tending to injure or destroy the people—a commission to investigate thoroughly and make report to the Congress of the United States, and in this way to the nation itself, so that we may have certain facts which shall be regarded as settled, certain statistics on which we may rely.

One class of men to-day claims, and honestly claims, that prohibition is the great healing and cure of this terrible disease that is afflicting the nation. Another class of men, equally honest—it may be from the same State—declares that prohibition is an utter failure, and that license alone should be resorted to. On the one side, statistics gathered by the friends of prohibition are quoted in favor of that policy; and on the other side are cited statistics gathered by the friends of license. Thus we are as much adrift as we were before any investigation had been made on the one side or the other.

The bill which the Senate sent here provided that the commission should not consist exclusively of those in favor of one policy or the other, but of men interested in the subject and representing both sides of the question, so that the investigation should be fair, thorough, and complete, so that we might have their report to go to for trustworthy statistics gathered by them. Now, it does seem to me that no gentleman on this floor ought to object to that; and really that is all this bill is intended to accomplish; for this is the proposition of the memorials, bills, and petitions almost universally.

I will add that in order to obviate the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] touching the question of taxation, I propose to modify the report by striking out the words "any amendments to the Constitution limiting or controlling the importation, manufacture, or sale of the same."

Mr. SPARKS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Senate organized a commission for this purpose?

Mr. FRYE. I say that the Senate twice passed a bill, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House, authorizing a commission to investigate this subject.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, as the gentleman from Maine now proposes to modify it, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed by the Speaker, to whom shall be referred all memorials, bills, and resolutions touching the alcoholic traffic, and a commission on the same, whose duty it shall be to consider and report thereupon.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have a very profound respect for the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] and those whom he represents in a desire to suppress intoxication and the too frequent use of intoxicating liquors. I believe with him and them that temperance is a virtue, and so far as the Government of the United States has any power over moral questions that it might be right for us to interpose our authority. But I fail to find in the argument of the gentleman, in the statements of fact by the gentleman, in the reasons he has given to the House for the adoption of this proposition, anything that requires a standing committee of this House for the purposes he has indicated. If he desires to accomplish what he says he does, why should not the gentleman introduce a bill and let that bill have its proper reference and be duly considered by a committee which shall report back to this House so that the House may take action upon it?

Now, sir, we all know that one of the great difficulties we now labor under in this House is the difficulty of ascertaining what the prerogatives and privileges of the standing committees of this House are. We have continual conflicts. There is some doubt to which committee shall go a proposition affecting the coins of the country. There is some doubt as to which committee of the House shall have control of the subject of the legal-tender issue. There is grave doubt as to whether the Committee of Ways and Means or the Committee on Foreign Affairs shall have jurisdiction over the question of our commercial treaties abroad. We are constantly involved here in confusion and in delay and in doubt as to what are the peculiar duties and privileges of the existing committees. And now the gentleman from Maine proposes that which will increase this difficulty. He has a proposition that gives to a new committee the question of control over the traffic in spirituous liquors. Now, sir, that word "traffic" has an exceedingly indefinite meaning. If it is put within the power of that committee to deal with the traffic in spirituous liquors, that necessarily would affect the revenue which the Government now derives from the manufacture of spirituous liquors. That committee may report a bill here that may increase the burden on the manufacturer so as to suppress it entirely. They may do that from moral reasons, and carrying out this view of the moral government of the country they might recommend what would decrease the revenue to the extent of fifteen to twenty millions of dollars a year. That committee might report a bill here that would cut off the importation of all foreign liquors into this country, and thus deprive us of $10,000,000 a year derived from the duties on wines and spirituous liquors from abroad.

Therefore, sir, I am opposed to the proposition. I am willing to consider a bill introduced by the gentleman from Maine or any other gentleman to organize a commission to consider this question. I would look at that proposition when it comes here upon its merits; and I will go as far as any member of this House in any rightful constitutional way and mode to suppress the too frequent use of intoxicating liquors. But I do believe, sir, there is a limitation to the power of the Federal Government. I do believe there are some powers in the municipalities and in the States; and I doubt very much whether the Congress of the United States can arrogate jurisdiction to itself over questions of a moral, of a religious, or of a purely municipal or local character. No such powers were ever delegated to the National Government by the States originally; and hence those powers have been reserved by the States. I am opposed to the proposition to raise this committee and move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. FRYE. I have not yielded the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has control of the floor.

Mr. FRYE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

Mr. STEPHENS. I concur in the main with all that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has said, except in his conclusion. I am in favor of this resolution, not because of my advocacy of the legislation invoked, but because of my recognition of the great right of petition. The people of this country have a right to petition. This is secured by the Constitution. Petitions on this subject from great numbers, perhaps millions of the people of the United States, have been sent here. I might not grant a single one of them, but in my judgment these memorialists have a right to have a committee as an organ in this House, through which their views may be presented to the country. They have a right to be heard. This does not commit me to sanction anything they may ask. But I will hear them, and if they convince me that their ideas are right I will sanction them. But that is not the question now. That simply is this: shall these millions of memorialists have a right to a hearing under the Constitution of the United States? I say they shall so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BEALE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEALE. Have not all those petitions been received and referred?

Mr. STEPHENS. They have been received but have been buried. They have never had a hearing. They have been sent to different committees who have never reported. I say, let these memorialists have a committee, an organ that will present their views to the country with whatever argument they can enforce them. Let them have a hearing. That is my view.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word or two more on this rule before it is acted upon. The object of investigation ought to be to lay the foundation for action. If no action can be taken, no investigation is justified. The right of petition does not at all depend on this rule. I would go as far as the gentleman from Georgia in vindicating and maintaining the right of petition on the part of the people of the United States on any subject on which they wish to be heard. But as I have said, the legitimate object of investigation is to lay the foundation for action; and suppose we create this committee and receive any number of petitions on the subject contemplated by the rule and refer them to the committee, and suppose the committee consider them and report back to the House, what are we going to do with the report? Are we going to take jurisdiction of the subject because we have created a rule, and because the people under that rule have sent in petitions, and those petitions have been referred, as all petitions that are respectful ought to be received and referred. We go through all this process, and when we have got through we answer the memorialists as we might answer them, "We have no constitutional authority to say what people shall make, what they shall sell, what they shall eat, or what they shall drink; we have no constitutional authority to control any one of these things." Yet, sir, the very adoption of this rule would be a formal act on the part of the House of Representatives undertaking to assume jurisdiction over these questions.

I wish to say right here that, while I would do as much as I could to aid in securing that temperance which is so necessary to the healthful morals of the country, I do not propose to undertake to do it by violating the Constitution of the United States, the great bulwark of the liberties of our country. The most crying evil of these times, and I do not doubt that the historian of the future will recognize it to be the most crying evil of these times, is the disposition of Congress to ignore the existence of the Constitution of the United States, and to take hold of and act upon every subject that comes up.

We have just as much authority to take jurisdiction over the administrators and executors of estates; just as much authority to prescribe rules in relation to the internal government of the States on other subjects, as we have to prescribe what they shall make, what they shall produce, what they shall buy and sell or eat and drink. Sir, we forget that Congress has its defined duties under the Constitution of the United States. It has its powers limited and controlled by that instrument, and we seem to forget that the very people who send us here are the people who create the Legislatures and who elect members to them and charge them with their duties of attending to all such questions as come within their several jurisdictions. These people, if they see proper to control this question, know that there is a proper jurisdiction under which they can act, and that they certainly have as much power or right to have such power as can be exercised over their State governments which may constitutionally control the subject, as they have or ought to have authority over Congress.

I would therefore remit a question of this kind to the local governments of a State, where the wishes of the people can be affirmed or expressed as well as here.

If it be said that this resolution gives Congress jurisdiction over the subject by limiting the importation of liquors, then I say that that part of the resolution of the gentleman from Maine has been stricken out, and that was the only feature in the whole rule in which there was a pretense of giving the jurisdiction to this House, and that has been stricken out on the motion of the gentleman who reported the resolution.

Mr. FRYE. I desire now to control the floor; gentlemen have been taking it without my recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in a moment. The Chair is under obligation to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.]

Mr. COFFROTH. I rise to support the resolution presented by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] I believe the time has come when the petitions of the people coming from all parts of the country against the great evil of intemperance should be heard, and a committee appointed to make a thorough investigation into the causes of intemperance, and if need be report how the alarming spread of drunkenness throughout the country can be prevented.

Gentlemen talk about it establishing the principle of legislating as to what we shall eat or drink in order to divert public attention from the real issue; but, sir, when we are faced with the startling figures of one hundred thousand persons annually being sent to drunkards' graves we should not hesitate for a moment. There has been legislation here time after time in regard to diseases, in regard to the prevention of that which curses mankind, and if there ever was a curse to the human family, it is the crime of intemperance. Therefore, sir, I repeat, I am in favor of appointing this committee, and that the investigation be made, and, if necessary, I am in favor of prudent legislation on this subject to prevent the cause of the evil we all have so keenly felt. At an early day Congress passed a law against the importation of slaves into this country, and they followed it with statute after statute, until they made it piracy, with the penalty of death, to import slaves into this country. In my opinion intemperance is a far greater evil and more destructive to the prosperity of our country than ever human slavery was, and we should as soon as possible eradicate the cause of this great evil, and thereby insure happiness and prosperity to our people and honor and power to our great nation.

Mr. FRYE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no trouble as to the constitutionality of this resolution. If gentlemen will remember that by the express provision of the Constitution itself Congress wields the only legislative power over this city of one hundred and sixty thousand inhabitants and over the District of Columbia, and have absolute control over Territories larger in the aggregate than the whole continent of Europe, I think they will see that we are not without jurisdiction over this subject, in at least a sufficient amount of territory to make it important to know whether we ought to legislate upon it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It is by expressed provision of the Constitution that we have such jurisdiction.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, that provision alone is sufficient to authorize us to form a committee, even if they did nothing but to consider the demands of the District of Columbia upon this subject. When there are probably one thousand rum-shops under the shadow of this Capitol, and the citizens of the District have applied to us over and over again to legislate on this subject, we ought at least to give them a hearing.

Mr. CLYMER. I would like to know the gentleman's opinion, whether because we have jurisdiction over the District of Columbia and the Territories we can interfere in this matter in the States?

Mr. GARFIELD. No; but we have plenty of territory over which our jurisdiction is unquestioned; and if there were nothing but that, we would be amply authorized by the Constitution to raise such committee and to make such inquiries, if for no other reason; but there are other reasons which would enable us to carry this matter into the States, as I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will see.

We are empowered to regulate commerce with foreign nations. If we find that some deleterious substance is being sent into this country, we can prohibit it by embargo if we choose, as everybody admits. Again, we fix our tariff duties on all imports, including foreign liquors.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman——

Mr. GARFIELD. Not now, if you please. Furthermore we are levying internal-revenue taxes on whisky in various forms, which are to-day producing a revenue of almost $100,000,000 a year. Surely it is not improper or unlawful for us to inquire how far, if at all, we shall consider the moral element in levying taxes. I do not assert that we have the general control of morals; but it may be our duty to inquire how far morals shall regulate our actions when we levy taxes, and how far we may fairly consider the relation of our taxes to the morals of the people.

For instance, when it is proposed to levy an income tax, I am always ready to say that theoretically the income tax is the fairest tax in the world. Practically, however, it is the most immoral tax that was ever levied on our people, for the reason that it creates more perjury, more fraud, more lying, more backbiting, more secret hunting into the private affairs of the people than all other taxes combined. I refer to this to show that the moral element should be considered when Congress is levying a public tax.

Now, when we are levying taxes on wines, beer, and spirituous liquors it is proper for us to inquire how the tax we are levying will affect the morals of our people, whether in the States or the Territories. And if we had a committee that would listen to all these petitions, that would collect facts and statistics from all quarters of the country, in a fair, economical, and reasonable way, it would not hurt any member of this House to have his intelligence illuminated and his conscience informed on the relation of the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors to the public welfare.

Now, on this ground, and particularly on the ground so well stated by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] it is but right that this great body of American petitioners should have a fair hearing. I commit myself now to no theory, no doctrine of sumptuary laws; but only say that it is the business of this House to get information. "In all your gettings get wisdom" was a wise saying as early as Solomon; and it ought not to be despised in the House of Representatives.

Mr. FRYE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] for five minutes.

Mr. MONROE. I desire to express my gratification that the Committee on Rules has presented this report. I think the immense number of petitions which have reached the House of Representatives from all quarters of the land upon the different aspects of this great question deserves the appointment of a separate committee of this kind. I happen to be well acquainted with the facts to which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has alluded in regard to the passage of bills by the Senate for the commission upon alcoholic liquors which have been referred by this House to the Committee on the Judiciary, because a great number of petitions upon that question from the State of Ohio were intrusted to me. I do not rise to find fault with the Committee on the Judiciary, because I know the immense number of matters of the greatest importance which have been referred to that committee and which demanded their attention. But for the very reason that that committee has so much other responsible work to do, I am glad that the proposition for the appointment of a new committee has come before the House, and I shall vote for it with the greatest satisfaction. It has long seemed to me that the great number of people, the thousands of respectable people of this country, who were petitioning Congress that this great question might at least have consideration at the hands of this House, have not been treated with proper respect. Of course there was no intentional disrespect, but really they were not treated with proper respect in not having their petitions considered.

I wish to add one word upon another branch of the question to which my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] has alluded. At the last session of Congress there was intrusted to me a petition signed by the accredited representatives of fifty-three temperance organizations, secular and religious, in the District of Columbia, representing more than six thousand members, and, I believe, really representing a majority of the substantial citizens of the District, asking that Congress should take up the question of legislation to provide against the evils of intemperance in the District of Columbia. I had these petitions referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia along with a very moderate bill which I had prepared, but that committee happened at the time to be intensely occupied with some question of local taxation, and the matter did not receive consideration at their hands. Here again we find reason for the appointment of a new committee.

While my bill and petition were pending before the committee in the last Congress, I received a letter from the excellent superintendent of police of this city, Major Morgan, who is known to many of you as a gentleman of the highest character. He wrote me a letter in which he expressed his good wishes for my success, and stated that there are more than five hundred licensed bar-rooms in the District and that it is estimated that there are three hundred additional places where liquor is sold contrary to law. He added that seven-tenths of all the arrests made here—all the crimes against good order—were due directly to the immoderate use of intoxicants. Certainly this District is entitled to have its petitions on this subject considered, and to have a committee appointed which shall have time enough to perform this duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The five minutes of the gentleman have expired.

Mr. FRYE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] for five minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, there is much specious reasoning presented in support of the resolution before the House. The real object is indisputable as disclosed in the proposition as originally reported: first, a special committee to consider petitions on the subject of intemperance; second, a commission; and third, a constitutional amendment on the subject, with the view of correcting evils resulting from the excessive or intemperate use of intoxicating liquors. Now, I trust the House will see fit to lay this matter on the table, as suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.]

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] whose fertile mind is always ready with ideas and arguments in support of any purpose which he may have in view, apprehending difficulty in the minds of members of the House on the question of constitutional power, apprehending the feeling of the people of this country against interfering with them in their social habits or religious tastes, comes forward to show to us the power we have on this subject. In advocating the purposes set forth in the resolution, he seeks to have us close our eyes to the distinction between the power of this Government regarding the District of Columbia or the Territories and its power with regard to the States of the Union.

Now, sir, as to the District of Columbia, the people of this District have the right of petition; there is a committee of this House charged with the duty of considering especially the interests of the District. Is the gentleman able to say that this committee has refused to these petitioners a hearing?

Again, he says that in the matter of levying the internal-revenue tax we may have need to consider the moral aspects of the question. Has this House, has the gentleman from Ohio, any trouble about the moral aspects of intemperance? Why, sir, that is a mere pretense. Again, he says we may want to prevent the importation of poisonous liquors from abroad. Sir, is this all that these gentlemen are seeking? No, sir; it is more than that. There is a class of people in this country who are eternally wanting to regulate the conduct and habits of other people; and though they find they are obstructed in this endeavor by our Constitution and by the genius of our people, they persist in their efforts. Here they are at this time seeking to have us go before the country with a constitutional amendment on this subject.

Now, I am opposed to any interference with religion. I am opposed to interference with people in any of the avocations of life. I am in favor of submitting this matter to the States who may regulate it as they see fit, to the extent of their powers on this subject. I have as much abhorrence of intemperance as any one, but I do not like too much of the paternal spirit in the administration of government. I believe that the people of this country are able to think for themselves. The difficulty has been in the Government attempting to do too much thinking for them and too much regulating.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRYE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, as particular reference has been made to the action of the Committee on the Judiciary touching this subject, I deem it incumbent on me to say it is true that during the last Congress and the Congress before the last, numerous petitions asking for the organization of a commission to inquire into the alcoholic liquor traffic were referred to that committee, and what the views of other members of that committee may have been I do not know; but for one I am free to say that I opposed a report by the committee upon those petitions; first, because I considered the project proposed as not only unnecessary but as setting a mischievous precedent in the Federal legislation in this country. It occurred to me that the establishment of such a commission would possibly be seized upon as a pretext for raising other commissions to inquire into other matters of a sumptuary or domestic character—a commission perhaps to ascertain whether it is not detrimental to public morals for a husband to kiss his wife on Sunday, and whether a barrel of beer should not be chastised for working upon the Lord's day! [Laughter.]

I opposed a report from that committee on another ground—that under the rules of this House the Committee on the Judiciary had no more jurisdiction over the subject proposed than they would have over a proposition to revise the Catholic missal or the Episcopal prayer-book. I believed then, as I believe now, that the Committee of Ways and Means have absolute jurisdiction of the question, and to that committee such propositions ought to be referred.

Now, the question of temperance is not the one before the House. The real question, I beg leave to submit, is whether this House will take from one of its standing committees a matter clearly and without dispute within its jurisdiction and raise a special committee to consider it. If this is to be done, there is no protection to any standing committee under our rules. The Committee of Ways and Means, as I have suggested, have ample jurisdiction of this subject; and happily for the country, happily for the cause of temperance, happily for the moral character of this House, both the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the no less distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] are members of that committee. I am sure that when petitions of this character are presented to that committee they will receive at the hands of those gentlemen all the consideration the importance of the subject may demand.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. KNOTT. Certainly.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Did not the gentleman from Kentucky tell us a few moments ago that the Judiciary Committee had no more to do with this question than it had with the liturgy of the Episcopal Church, and that if this proposition was entertained we would soon have to raise a committee to inquire into other sumptuary matters? If that be the view of the committee, may we expect a report from them on this subject?

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman did not understand me to say that; or rather he may have understood me so; but I did not say it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRYE. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Maine to say merely that though this resolution is reported from the Committee on Rules, I as a member of that committee do not agree with the majority as to the propriety of its adoption. I simply want to state my opposition to the resolution.

Mr. FRYE. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and then I will ask the previous question.

Mr. WARNER. Are we in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. We are not.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I presume from the petitions that have been sent to this House during the last ten years that a majority of all the good men and women of these United States believe Congress has the right to make an investigation in regard to the use or the abuse of alcoholic liquors in this country. Sir, if all these petitions could be put together they would amount to hundreds of thousands of men and women in this country who believe, in their ignorance perhaps, that the great Legislature of this nation can act in regard to what they solemnly believe is the most serious, the most vital, the most dangerous subject of any in all our realm. Those petitions are sent here. Before the Committee on the Judiciary thousands and thousands of those petitions were received in the last Congress, and the Judiciary Committee by its majority refused to make any recommendation to this House whatever.

I see solemn reasons why the people of the United States should not be heard. [Laughter.] The chairman of the Judiciary Committee has given one. He says if we yield to these demands of the thousands and hundreds of thousands of men and women of the United States to investigate the abuse of alcoholic spirits the next year petitions will come up asking for an amendment of the Constitution that we may lawfully prevent the barrel of beer from working on Sunday. [Laughter.] Sublime idea, but not original—worthy of being made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary as a reason given to these hundreds and thousands of good honest men and women why their petitions should be thrown aside and have no hearing anywhere.

Why should we not have a committee? If these people are mistaken about the duty and rights of Congress to investigate the subject, let that committee tell us and let it make it satisfactory to the people of the country why this body should not investigate one of the greatest and most crying evils in all our land.

I had hoped that the Judiciary Committee would report on this subject in the last Congress. They refused to do so. I am thankful the Committee on Rules has introduced this measure, and, sir, I do desire to have a record of the Representatives of the people here whether they are willing there shall be a committee to investigate these ten thousand petitions and complaints and report to the people some remedy for the evil, or to tell the people that we are powerless to provide a remedy.

Mr. FRYE. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. When will it be in order to move to lay this whole subject upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order either before or after seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I move to lay the subject upon the table.

Mr. BREWER. And on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question on the motion to lay upon the table before putting the question to the House on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask for the reading of the proposition again.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman propose to have it read as originally reported or as it is proposed to be modified?

Mr. CONVERSE. In both ways.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certain gentlemen seem to understand that the resolution as read is not the one now before the House, but that there was some amendment made.

The SPEAKER. The resolution reported by the gentleman from Maine from the Committee on Rules has just been read, but the gentleman from Maine has stated that he wanted to amend it (which the House only can do at this stage of proceeding) so as to omit that feature of the proposition looking to the constitutional question.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I ask to strike out that part of the resolution relating to the amendment of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the right to modify a report of a committee, but he can move an amendment in his own individual right.

Mr. SPARKS. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen could amend it if he had the consent of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FRYE. Then I will ask consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know how the gentleman is now to get the consent of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FRYE. I did not understand the Chair to refer to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to modify so as to get clear of the constitutional objection.

Mr. FRYE. Will not the unanimous consent of the House allow that to be done?

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent to the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. KNOTT. Is this in order during the call of the roll?

The SPEAKER. Nothing is in order except by the unanimous consent. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. KNOTT. I do object.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask, then, that the resolution may be again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has just been read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know it has. I ask that it be read again.

Mr. BREWER. I object.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 99, nays 128, not voting 58; as follows:

Mr. STEVENSON. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. CARLISLE.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the amendment; and being put, it was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—R. S. THAIN.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee of Elections. I desire to report back a memorial from the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is it touching the right of a member to his seat?

Mr. CALKINS. No, it is not; but I ask unanimous consent to make the following adverse report.

Mr. WARNER. Will it lead to debate?

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, no!

Mr. CALKINS then, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee of Elections the petition of R. S. Thain; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the petition was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, by unanimous consent, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2002) making additional appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the coinage bill.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 113, noes 62.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-three minutes to two o'clock, and the business coming over from the morning hour of last Friday is a report from the Committee of Accounts in regard to salaries, being the joint resolution (H. R. No. 62) reported from the Committee of Accounts, fixing the day on which the payment of committee clerks and pages of the House of Representatives who are paid during the session only shall begin for this session.

The question was upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] and accepted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] and then the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] moved to recommit the whole subject to the Committee of Accounts, and the question now is upon the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee of Accounts, reported back the following papers, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee of Claims:

Resolution for payment of La Fayette H. Fitzhugh, ex-Doorkeeper;

Bill (H. R. No. 714) for the relief of Alvah W. Hicks;

Petition for relief of C. R. Faulkner, late an employé of the House of Representatives;

Petition of Daniel Kernan, for relief; and Petition for compensation for services rendered to the House Committee on War Claims during the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress by Shepard S. Everett.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be understood that these papers when referred to the Committee of Claims shall not come back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That order will be made.

Mr. FORT. I wish to inquire whether those accounts for the payment of officers of this House should go to the Committee of Claims?

The SPEAKER. That is the report of the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. FORT. They are claims against the Government, but they are also claims against the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes the report as a quasi negative on the part of the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. FORT. I do not object to the change of reference if it is understood that the Committee of Claims have jurisdiction of such matters.

The SPEAKER. The House has the right to give jurisdiction.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. This is the conclusion come to by the Committee of Accounts, after having investigated the character of the claims.

The SPEAKER. It has been held that accounts of a former Congress should not be paid out of the contingent fund of a subsequent House. The Chair thinks there has been a decision of the Treasury Department in accordance with that view.

Mr. FORT. I suppose the Committee of Accounts do not report against the merits.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. We never inquired into the merits. The only question was as to our having jurisdiction of the claims, and we considered that they belonged to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that Comptroller Porter gave a decision that claims of this kind should not be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, but by appropriation duly made by law.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. They should go to the Committee of Claims, to be examined by that committee in the first instance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair repeats that the view of the Comptroller is that they require an appropriation.

Mr. FORT. I think one or two of the matters reported are very meritorious.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. We have not decided at all as to that; but we think these cases belong to the Committee of Claims.

DEPRESSION OF LABOR.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am directed by the Committee to inquire into the causes of the present Depression of Labor to report for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the additional sum of $2,000 be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the use of the Select Committee to inquire into the causes of the present Depression of Labor, so as to enable them to carry out the order of the House heretofore made, and said sum shall be available at once.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that that is public business, not private.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman promised me not to make any objection.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] raises that point of order, the Chair will have to sustain it.

Mr. WRIGHT. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER. That it is public business; and to-day being Friday, private business takes precedence.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is compelled to sustain it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope the point will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can report it when his committee is called upon another day.

Mr. WHITE. I would inquire if the object of this resolution is to provide means to take my colleague to California? [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not stand here to be interrogated. I will say that it becomes necessary and important that the committee should have money enough to enable it to discharge its duties. There may not be during this session another call of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there will be.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. CONGER. What is the pressing public necessity for this thing?

Mr. WRIGHT. I am making a personal appeal to the gentleman. I know he has a kind heart in his body.

Mr. CONGER. What pressing necessity is there for acting upon this resolution to-day?

Mr. WRIGHT. We may not have another opportunity to get at it.

Mr. CONGER. Is this to pay the expenses of the committee in their investigation?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is.

Mr. CONGER. I am not so very sure but what I may have been mistaken. I begin to think that perhaps this is to provide for purely private expenses. [Laughter.] If the gentleman says that it is to provide the means for an excursion of his committee, I will withdraw the objection; if he says it is for the mere private expenses of the committee——

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the objection is withdrawn.

Mr. WHITE. No, it is not.

Mr. WRIGHT. Why do you object?

Mr. WHITE. Because you would not answer my question.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution is not before the House.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, from the Select Committee on Epidemic Diseases, reported favorably the bill (H. R. No. 1604) to increase the efficiency of the National Board of Health and to prevent the introduction into or spread within the United States of contagious and infectious diseases.

Mr. DUNNELL. I make the point of order that that is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOODE. Would it be in order to ask now that some day be fixed for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] objects to its being reported at all.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will not object to fixing some day for its consideration.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask the House to give leave to me to report this bill for consideration on Tuesday next, after the morning hour. It is a very important measure, and the demand for some action is very urgent.

Mr. COX. Has this bill been reported to the House to-day?

The SPEAKER. It has not been, because there was objection to it. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] now asks leave to report this bill on Tuesday next, after the morning hour, for consideration.

Mr. COX. This bill is not now before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The request is for leave to report this bill on Tuesday next for consideration after the morning hour. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would suggest to the gentleman to modify his request, so that the bill may be brought up for consideration immediately after the conclusion of the action of the House on the silver bill. In that way it may be reached before Tuesday. I would not like to have this bill interfere with the silver bill when perhaps it may be within a few votes of being disposed of.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I will modify my request in accordance with that suggestion.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Printing for consideration at this time a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest to members that they had better confine their reports to private bills to-day.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. This is not a private bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I object.

STEAMBOAT ALEXIS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 178) to provide for the change of name of the steamboat Alexis, accompanied by a report in writing.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the owner of the American built and owned steamboat Alexis, of New York, to change her name to Riverdale.

The report was read, as follows:

Your committee, to whom was referred House bill No. 178, providing for the change of name of the steamboat Alexis to Riverdale, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report.

They find that the steamboat Alexis is employed on the Hudson River, and is owned by Alexander M. C. Smith, a gentleman of high character and responsibility, who has submitted to us a statement, under oath, in relation to said steamboat, giving his reasons for desiring the change of name, which is herewith submitted as a part of this report:

"Statement in relation to bill now before the House of Representatives to change the name of steamboat Alexis to that of Riverdale.

"The steamboat Alexis was built in Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey, in the year 1871. The original cost, according to the best of deponent's knowledge and belief, was about $60,000. The registered tonnage is 432 99 tons. She has been engaged in navigating the inland waters of the State of New York, viz: from New York City to Peekskill, stopping at intermediate points. I intend to place her on the same route.

"My reason for desiring a change of name is that said boat may be named after a town on her route, instead of a foreign prince. As I am also owner of the steamboats Idlewild, Rosedale, and Tappan Zee, the proposed name will be more in consonance with the others.

"The said steamboat Alexis is entirely free and clear of debt. She is registered in the port of New York. I am now refitting said boat with new engines, boilers, &c., at a cost of about $20,000. I became owner of said boat on October 26, 1878, by purchase from the receiver of the North River and New York Steamboat Company, said sale having been ordered by and approved of by the supreme court for the second judicial district of New York.

"ALEX. M. C. SMITH, 232 West street, New York.

"Personally came before me, this 30th day of April, 1879, the above-named Alexander M. C. Smith, to me known, and who, being duly sworn, says that the above statement is true and of his own personal knowledge, except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes them to be true.

"CARSON G. ARCHIBALD,
"Commissioner of Deeds, City and County, New York."

We deem the reasons given in this statement for changing the name of the steamboat as good and sufficient, and see no reason why the request should not be granted, and therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that I have uniformly opposed changing the name of passenger steamboats in all cases where the public might be misled by the change to think that they were traveling upon a new boat. The statement of facts in this case shows that this boat is not a very old one; that she is to run upon the same route where she has heretofore run, and where everybody will be presumed to know that she is the same boat with the name changed. The objections which generally apply to changing the name of a boat, and thereby misleading the public to endanger their lives by traveling upon an old boat which they suppose to be a new one, do not apply in this case. I make no objection, therefore, to this bill, but desire that its passage shall not be used as a precedent for returning to the old practice of giving new names to old boats indiscriminately, thereby running the risk of repeating the catastrophes which were so common a few years ago on this account.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there is no good reason why this change of name should not be made. The facts have been placed before the House in the report. I trust there will be no objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. P. ZIMMERMAN AND H. P. SNOW.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. No. 2003) for the relief of J. P. Zimmerman and H. P. Snow, of Clinton County, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Zimmerman & Snow $100, the amount of a forfeited mail-route bond paid by them.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit the point of order that this bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The bill will be so referred.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back adversely a bill to amend section 7, chapter 103, of the act of March 3, 1877.

The bill was read. It provides that the section named in the title be amended by inserting after the words "through the mails" the word "free;" and by inserting after the words "by order of Congress" the words "and all letters written or received in their official capacity;" so that the section will read:

The Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, may send and receive through the mail, free, all public documents printed by order of Congress, and all letters written or received in their official capacity; and the name of each Senator, Representative, Delegate, Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be written thereon with the proper designation of the office he holds; and the provisions of this section shall apply to the persons named therein until the 1st day of December following the expiration of their respective terms of office.

Mr. BLOUNT. This bill is subject to a point of order upon two grounds: in the first place, it is a public bill; and in the next place, it makes an appropriation of money out of the Treasury.

Mr. COOK. It is an adverse report; it takes no money out of the Treasury.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood that the bill was reported for the favorable action of the House.

Mr. COOK. It is an adverse report, restricting the franking privilege to what it is now.

The SPEAKER. The fact that the bill is reported adversely does not obviate the point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that it is a public bill and cannot be reported to-day.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that this is a public bill and not entitled to be reported under this call, it is immaterial whether the bill be reported favorably or adversely. The Chair sustains the point of order.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask by unanimous consent, not being in when the Committee on Appropriations was called, to submit the following report from that committee for action at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to have the eastern lobby on the floor of the House furnished and fitted for the reception of visitors, and that the small room now occupied for that purpose be assigned to the use of the Committee on Appropriations, which by its increase in numbers requires additional accommodations; and that he be authorized to order and have made such alterations in the building as will conveniently connect said small room with the present Appropriation Committee room.

Mr. CONGER. I object if it is to shut off the corridor from the window of which we have the only air that comes from that direction.

Mr. HAWLEY. It does not cut off the air at all.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the report being received?

Mr. CONGER. I do.

G. ALEXANDER RAMSEY.

Mr. GUNTER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 487) for the relief of G. Alexander Ramsey, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

PIERRE JOSEPH MAES.

Mr. GUNTER, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1916) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Joseph Maes; and the same was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

CHARLES OLIVIER DUCLOZEL.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2004) to confirm the title of Charles Olivier Duclozel to certain lands in the State of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that a certain tract of land, of ten arpents front by forty arpents in depth, on the west side of Bayou Teche, situated in township 10 south, range 6 east, southwestern district, Louisiana, and known on the plat of the United States consolidated land office, district of Louisiana, as section 79, claim of Olivier Duclozel, be, and the title to the same under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of Congress approved June 22, 1860, and extended by the act of Congress approved June 10, 1872, is hereby, confirmed to the said Charles Olivier Duclozel, his heirs or assigns.

The accompanying report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred H. R. bill, to confirm the title of Charles Olivier Duclozel to certain lands in the State of Louisiana, begs leave to submit the following report:

The parcel of land described in the bill is part of a tract of land alleged to have been granted by the Spanish government to Barnard Danterive in 1775. The said grant to Danterive has been recognized by the confirmation of claims to several portions thereof by several different claimants at different times. (See American State Papers, Duff Green's edition, volume 2, page 703, and volume 3, pages 136, 137, and 171.) Said Duclozel claims title through this grant. In his chain of title there are some defects, but such defects consist only in the fact of the loss of some title papers, and this prior to 1834. Valery Veillow conveyed said lands to Charles Olivier Duclozel June 14, 1836. Said Duclozel conveyed said lands by warranty deed to William B. Sproule in November, 1869. On the 5th day of February, 1873, the register and receiver of the United States land office in the district of Louisiana recommended that the title of said Duclozel to said land be confirmed. On the 3d day of June, 1874, the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommended that said title be not confirmed, because there was not a complete chain of title shown from said Danterive; but the Commissioner, in such recommendation, says: "Had the present claimant shown actual corporeal possession of the tract of land claimed from the date of his purchase in 1836, it would, in my opinion, in connection with the documents filed, have given him an equitable claim upon Congress for relief, notwithstanding he had failed to complete all the links in his chain of title." Proof has since said Commissioner's recommendation been furnished that said Duclozel entered into actual possession of said land at the time of his purchase, and has ever since continued in the actual possession thereof, and cultivated the same until he sold the same to said Sproule in 1869. Owing to the length of time which has elapsed since the alleged transfers were made of the said land which are necessary in the chain of paper title, and the further fact that said Duclozel and those claiming under him have been in actual possession of said land since 1836, and forasmuch as no other parties have made any claim to said land, the committee reach the conclusion that the said title to the parcel of land hereinafter more particularly described should be confirmed in the said Charles Olivier Duclozel, his heirs, assigns, or transferees, with the limitations and restrictions which the committee have hitherto adopted in similar cases.

Said Duclozel sold said Sproule, with some other lands, a parcel of twelve arpents front on the river Teche by forty arpents depth, being section 79 in township 10, south of range 6 east, in the southwest district of Louisiana. This is the parcel the title to which is desired to be confirmed. When said Duclozel sold said parcel of land to Sproule, he, by his contract, engaged that the title to said parcel of land should be perfected by act of Congress or otherwise. For said land Mr. Sproule executed his notes, which are unpaid. Said Sproule is dead. Said Duclozel is also dead. Legal proceedings are now pending to subject said lands for the benefit of the creditors of said Sproule. The widow of Duclozel is administratrix of the succession of her deceased husband's estate. She cannot collect the purchase-money due on said notes executed by Sproule, unless and until the title to said land is, in some manner, confirmed; and there seems to be no other means to obtain confirmation except by act of Congress. The Government of the United States is in no manner interested in this matter. It is simply a question whether the estate of Charles Olivier Duclozel shall have the money due from Sproule, to be collected by his widow and administratrix, Mrs. Olivier Duclozel, or whether the creditors of said Sproule shall have the benefit of the proceeds of the sale of said land to her exclusion. The committee are of the opinion that the purchase-money due from said Sproule should be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale of said land, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. This ought to go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, as it involves an appropriation out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of fact.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is shown by the papers themselves that it involves an appropriation under Rule 112.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman point out where?

Mr. BLOUNT. The purpose is to convey title from the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair closely attended to the reading of the bill and report, and the report contains this clause, which the Chair wrote down: "that the Government of the United States in no respect is interested in the matter."

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. None whatever.

Mr. CONGER. Then I object to the United States having anything to do with the business.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of argument.

Mr. BLOUNT. That may be the opinion of the committee, but it must be determined by the House. The bill purports to take title from the United States, and it should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. It is one thing to grant a title by the United States and quite a different thing where the Government proposes simply to confirm title. That is all this bill proposes to do. The printed record shows the Government has no interest in it whatever, but by reason of the loss of some title papers, under the acts of Congress referred to in the report, the receiver and register of lands in Louisiana could not confirm this title, or else the case would never have come to Congress.

The SPEAKER. Was the title ever in the United States?

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. The title was never in the United States. It is a grant originally of the Spanish government to a man by the name of Danterive. It becomes necessary, therefore, in the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that Congress should interpose in order to enable this widow, the representative of the decedent, to collect purchase-money due the estate. It is a mere question between the estate on the one hand and the creditors of the vendee on the other hand as to who shall have the money.

I insist that the report is right; that the widow ought to have the benefit of this purchase-money according to contract, and ought to be permitted to collect it. It is a mere contest between the widow and heirs of Duclozel on the one hand, the party who sold, and the creditors of the vendee on the other hand, who want to subject the land to the payment of this sum. That is all there is in it.

Mr. CONGER rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Michigan on the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. All the lands that could be embraced in this bill, by the Louisiana purchase belonged to the United States unless some title had been given by another government; and if that title had not been made complete it would have been confirmed by this Government. The release of this title confirms it to the claimants here; but if it is not released it belongs to the Government. The very sections referred to were in furtherance of ascertaining who is entitled to the lands.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman excuse me for an interruption? I know he wants to be right and I want to be right. The Government of the United States never had any title. It is a grant of the Spanish government to a man of the name of Danterive, in 1775.

Mr. CONGER. That is what I am speaking to. I say all the lands under the Louisiana purchase belonged by treaty and by purchase to the United States, except what had been sold to individuals and except grants that were incomplete, which the United States by the treaty promised to carry out.

Now, either that title belongs to these parties and has been confirmed to them by the Spanish government or by our Government or else the question of title is open. That must be the position of it. It cannot be any other way under the treaty and from the nature of the title. And what is proposed here is worse than confirming a title to an individual in this respect? If this were merely to confirm a title as between the United States and the widow represented here, then it might be proper for us to act upon it now without sending it to the Committee of the Whole; but I say it is not for Congress with this incomplete light upon the subject to determine between two claimants, to step into court and decide which of two claimants is entitled to purchase-money.

Now, I submit that the title must be granted by the United States to this widow for this bill to avail her anything; and it avails for her title not only as against the United States, but as against litigants that are contesting the title with her.

The Speaker well knows the results at one time or another of hasty action in regard to these old Spanish and French claims. We have, within my recollection as a member of the House, been placed by our action, on two or three occasions, in a very false position as individuals by voting for such legislation, and in a false and wrong position as a House of Representatives by passing hastily and without due examination laws which seem all right upon their face, but which are found soon after to have worked great hardship and great wrong to others, and in some cases have been absolute swindles of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The point of order in this case, the Chair desires to say, is confined to the question of fact whether the Government of the United States is in any respect interested in the matter of the ownership of this land, and to discover for himself the fact he desires to ask the gentleman from West Virginia one or two questions: first, whether this grant was made prior to the cession of the Territory; and second, whether the cession of the Territory was made subject to prior grants?

Mr. BUCKNER. If the gentleman from West Virginia will allow me, I will say that nearly all these Mexican and Spanish titles were granted, as I understand, before the cession of the Territory. That is the case in nine out of ten of these claims, and the Government of the United States has not had a particle of interest in them since that time.

Mr. GUNTER. I will add in connection with what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] that these same grants embraced a large amount of land, and all of the lands except the small portion here specified given under the grant have been confirmed to the parties heretofore. This has not been confirmed from the fact that some of the papers were lost and there was some little defect, which defect has since been supplied. The Commissioner of the General Land Office states this is a valid grant, made before the Government acquired the Territory of Louisiana, and that the Government is bound to protect these parties in their rights.

The SPEAKER. Has the Government of the United States ever exercised any authority of ownership over this land?

Mr. GUNTER. None whatever, either direct or indirect; but the original purchaser and the grantees from the original purchaser have had the land in possession and occupied it from the time of the grant until the present day.

Mr. ACKLEN. I merely wish to confirm what has already been so clearly stated by the gentleman from West Virginia. I am myself personally cognizant of all the facts in this case, and I desire to state most distinctly that, after a thorough investigation, I am satisfied the United States has not a scintilla of right or of interest in this case at all, nor is there any claim that it has.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ACKLEN. I must decline to yield.

Mr. CONGER. Then if the gentleman does not desire to enlighten us, so be it.

Mr. ACKLEN. I have the floor.

The grant was a Spanish grant, made, as the gentleman from West Virginia said, to Danterive. The papers upon which the case was based were not found, and the commissioner of the general land office in New Orleans refused therefore to confirm the title. This defect was afterward partly supplied, but, owing to a contract entered into at the time of the sale, it was necessary that the widow of Charles Olivier Duclozel should obtain the confirmation by act of Congress.

The point of order cannot be sustained because the United States has no interest at stake.

Mr. WILBER. From that showing I cannot see what the United States has to do with the case. If they have no title to this land, of course they can give none. I insist upon it that the Government of the United States cannot grant any title to what they do not hold.

Mr. ACKLEN. I will answer the gentleman in the words of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] by simply saying that the distinction is very broad between making a title and confirming a title. The confirmation of a title is merely carrying out an act already performed. That act was performed by the Spanish government, and not by the United States Government. The United States Government accepted this territory with the distinct understanding that all these Spanish grants should be respected, and under these circumstances I cannot see why the case is not perfectly clear to every member of this House. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and a similar unanimous report was made by the same committee in the Forty-fifth Congress. The members of the Committee on Private Land Claims have investigated the subject fully and thoroughly in both Congresses, and they united in making a unanimous report. The statement, the mere statement that the Government has no interest in this land should be sufficient to settle the matter in the mind of any member of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems to me from the fact stated by the gentleman from Louisiana that the bill is clearly subject to the point of order. If I understand the gentleman, he claims that this was a grant from the Spanish government, and that the evidence of that grant was all destroyed, and that then there was a transfer of this territory to the Government of the United States. The United States Government then stands in just the same relation to this party that the Spanish government did, to wit, that these gentlemen claim that there has been a grant of this property from the Government of the United States. They have no evidence of it. There is no evidence of any title given by the United States, and these men are here asking that their title shall be confirmed. It is just the same as if they claim that they held it under the United States, and they are here saying that they have lost their papers and asking that the error be corrected and the conveyance given to them.

Mr. WILBER. That is just my idea exactly.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I am sure that if gentlemen understood this case perfectly there could be no possible objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to hear an argument on the merits of the bill, but wishes to hear discussion only upon the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. To do that I am bound to state the facts, and I will give you the facts if I understand them correctly. I have examined this case with great care, as I do all cases that are referred to me. This was a grant made by the Spanish government in 1775 to a man by the name of Danterive of a large parcel of land.

The titles of portions of the land lying all around this piece have been confirmed to the claimants by the courts, by the register and receiver of the land office in Louisiana, and by everybody.

It is now a naked question whether Danterive is the owner of this piece of land, a little over one hundred acres, or rather whether his estate shall receive the benefit of the purchase-money that he contracted for, or whether the creditors of this man Sproule, to whom he sold, shall consume it all and then rob the Berard estate. That is all there is in it.

Now, it is true that, upon the point of order, whatever title the Spanish government had to this land it transferred it to the United States, but it had no title in fact. The original grant seems to have been lost, and that was the only trouble in this case or the title would have been confirmed without coming to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman whether there was ever any title to this land, in his judgment, in the United States?

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. None whatever.

The SPEAKER. Was there any contingent interest of the Spanish government which was conveyed to the Government of the United States?

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. None whatever that I am aware of. Spain could not grant to the United States, in her cession of territory, that which she did not herself possess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not quite understand the remark made by the gentleman a moment ago, that if there was any title resting in the Spanish government, that interest was transferred to the United States.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. The cession would have transferred to the United States whatever interest the Spanish government had in this land.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is endeavoring to find out, directly or indirectly, whether there was any interest in this land that passed from the Spanish government to the United States Government by which the United States acquired a title to this land.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. There could not be, except in this——

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants the exception.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I will give the Chair the exception, as I understand it. If the loss of a title paper, the original grant from Spain, would rob the grantees of their right of property and give it to the United States, then it might be so in this case. But the loss of a title never robbed a man of his right to the property, either in Congress or in court, if it could be shown that such paper had existed. It is shown in this case that the grant was made, and has been recognized, and lands have been confirmed all around this parcel of land.

Mr. CONGER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has, and this bill will go over until the next morning hour when this class of business will be in order, which will be on Friday next.

CATTLE DISEASES.

Mr. HATCH. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1378) to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious and contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will ask that some day be fixed for the consideration of that bill. I desire to have some time to examine it.

The SPEAKER. What is the object of the gentleman in reporting the bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood that the gentleman reported it for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to report it at any time.

Mr. HATCH. I ask that the bill be set for consideration on Tuesday next after the morning hour.

Mr. WHITE. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

Mr. HATCH. There is not; the bill is the report.

The SPEAKER. Under the action of the House the Committee on Agriculture has the right to report this bill at any time. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] now reports the bill, and asks that it be set for consideration on Tuesday next after the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. Not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. KENNA. And not to interfere with the silver bill, should it go over until that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the silver bill will be disposed of before that time.

Mr. KENNA. So do I, but it may not be.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill will be set for consideration on Tuesday next after the morning hour, if there be no objection, subject to appropriation bills and to the silver bill should that be pending at the time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

TAX ON LEAF-TOBACCO.

Mr. HATCH. I also desire to report another bill and have it set for consideration on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. Does the committee have the right to report the bill at any time?

Mr. HATCH. It is from the same committee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I must object. I wanted some time ago to report a much more important bill and have it set for consideration on an early day next week, and it was objected to.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The call for the regular order excludes the bill, because the Committee on Agriculture is not authorized to report it at any time.

Mr. HATCH. I do not think there will be objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The title of the bill was "A bill (H.R. No. 933) to repeal so much of the sixth clause of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes as prohibits farmers and planters from selling leaf-tobacco at retail directly to consumers without the payment of a special tax, and to allow farmers and planters to sell leaf-tobacco of their own production to other persons than manufacturers of tobacco without special tax."

Mr. CONGER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WARNER. I object to the bill being reported.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to reporting the bill, and therefore the motion to refer is not in order.

WATER SERVICE.

Mr. HENKLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8, "water service," of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

JACOB D. HUTTON.

Mr. LOUNSBERY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Jacob D. Hutton out of the contingent fund of the House the amount of one month's salary as a messenger on the soldiers' roll, from the date of his discharge from said roll.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BACHMAN, until Wednesday next;

To Mr. JOHNSTON, until Monday; and

To Mr. PRICE, for ten days, on account of important business.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] yields to me to again ask consent of the House to fix a day for the consideration of the quarantine bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has not control of the floor; the House has control of the business.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I thought it but due to the gentleman from Ohio, who has charge of the bill which is the regular order, to obtain his consent for me to submit the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the request of the gentleman and submit it to the House.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent of the House that leave be given to report on Thursday next after the morning hour the bill (H. R. No. 1604) to increase the efficiency of the National Board of Health and to prevent the introduction into or spread within the United States of contagious or infectious diseases. That is a very important bill, and I think the House should fix some early day for its consideration.

Mr. WARNER. Not to interfere with the coinage bill should it go over until that time.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I withdraw my objection if the bill is set down definitely for Tuesday next after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is to assign Thursday next after the morning hour for the consideration of the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

IMPORTATION OF NEAT CATTLE.

Mr. COVERT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2006) to amend sections 2493 and 2494 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the importation of neat cattle into the United States for breeding purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF CHOCTAW NATION.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, presented a report of the Committee on Indian Affairs upon the bill (H. R. No. 440) for the ascertainment of the amount due the Choctaw Nation; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

MARY P. THOMPSON.

Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2007) granting a pension to Mary P. Thompson, widow of James B. Thompson, late captain Company F, One hundred and ninetieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. WHITE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 82, noes 83.

Mr. WHITE. I call for tellers.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 122, not voting 66; as follows:

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the following amendment moved by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS:]

Strike out section 3 from the fourth to the fifteenth line, inclusive, and insert:

SEC. 3520. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, without limit, all silver bullion, trade-dollars, and foreign silver coins that may be offered for sale at the market value of silver, and such purchases shall be continued as long as 412½ grains of standard silver can be purchased for one dollar of legal-tender Treasury notes. All such purchases shall be paid for with a new issue of legal-tender Treasury notes. And all holders of any of the silver coins of the United States may present the same in any sum not less than $20 and receive therefor legal-tender Treasury notes at par for the same. That all silver coins of the United States shall be receivable in payment of all Government dues and shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public or private, for any sum whatever. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have the silver bullion, trade-dollars, and foreign silver pieces coined as fast as possible into American silver coins and to apply all silver coins of the United States that may come into the Treasury to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt before using any of the gold or Treasury notes of the Government for such purpose.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, there are two objects which may be obtained by the coining of silver, and I understand that it is the desire of the people to utilize silver for the attainment of these two objects. One of those objects is proposed to be reached by the bill, and one only, and that is to increase the volume of money, thereby depreciating the value of money and increasing the value of all property and labor, and lead to the employment of the idle labor of the country. The other object is to utilize all silver in the payment of all public and private indebtedness of the country, and that object this bill does not propose to reach. The amendment which I offer proposes to cover both grounds. Instead of free coinage of silver, permitting the mints to be run in the interest of the bullion-holders to their profit, and the coinage of silver to be made by the Government mints and thrown into circulation, I propose that the Government shall purchase all silver it can with Treasury notes or with gold, or with both. The gold dollar is at a premium of sixteen cents over the silver dollar. The Treasury-note dollar, being based upon the gold dollar, is of course just as valuable as a gold dollar. It is sixteen cents premium over the silver dollar.

Mr. ATKINS. The legal tender?

Mr. MILLS. No, the silver that may be made into a legal tender.

Mr. WARNER. Not its purchasing power.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, its purchasing power. If the legal-tender dollar is the same as the gold dollar its purchasing power is the same. And that it is the same is proved to-day by the Treasury having one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty millions of dollars of gold in its vaults which can be called for in exchange for the Treasury notes of the Government. But the holders of the Treasury notes refuse to demand the gold; the Treasury note being equal in all power to the gold dollar.

Now what I propose is that the Government shall purchase silver in unlimited quantities and coin it; coin it all for the benefit of the people and give it all the debt-paying power of the legal-tender dollar; that the dollar, half dollar, quarter dollar, and dime—in a word, all the silver coins struck from your mints shall be invested with all the functions of money; that they shall measure value, exchange value, and pay value. Well, what will be the result of that when you give them all this debt-paying power.

Then the silver that comes into the Treasury can be used in payment of your public debt. You cannot pay it with Treasury notes, for the creditor holds you are bound to pay him in coin. But you can pay it with the cheaper metal, with silver when it is cheaper than gold. And it is the duty of the Government to pay the people's debts, just as you would pay your own debts, with the cheaper metal.

But you cannot pay the public debt with silver if you merely coin for the bullion-holder who owns the Nevada mines, because you simply coin his bullion for him, and he takes it back in the form of coin. But if you purchase the silver you help to bring the Treasury notes into circulation, and you coin the dollar as your own, and then you make use of that dollar in the payment of your indebtedness.

I further provide in my amendment that all persons having these silver coins may bring them to the Treasury in any quantity, $50,000 or $100,000 or any other amount, and exchange them at par for legal-tender notes. Now, the Treasury note is a much more convenient money than the silver money. It is not so heavy, of course. It is equally valuable with gold. And just as long as the Treasury note is worth ¼ per cent. more than the silver dollar all the silver would go into the Treasury to get the benefit of the ¼ per cent. premium. And when it goes to the Treasury, either by purchase or exchange, the Secretary is directed to pay it on the public debt before using the gold or Treasury notes. When a large amount of silver shall be coined and in circulation it will seek the Treasury to be exchanged for the more convenient and equally valuable Treasury-note money, which may be constantly applied in reduction of the public debt. We cannot pay the debt in gold. The creditor will not accept it in paper, and silver is our only hope for deliverance from its burden. I trust we shall not disappoint the reasonable expectations of our people by refusing to use it for that purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CASWELL. The charge has so often been made in this House that the silver dollar was omitted from the coinage act of 1873 by a trick or fraud that I deem it proper to call the attention of the House to a little history which seems to me to dispel any such idea. Prior to the act of 1873 the silver dollar commanded for sixteen years a premium of 1 to 4 per cent. It will readily be seen that the United States Government could not afford to coin and continue in circulation in the United States a silver dollar that was worth three to four cents premium over gold. Such an act would have been in the interest of the creditor and bondholder instead of against him; for it would have been in his interest to continue the coinage and use of money which would command a premium in the United States and abroad. I, myself, believe it was a mistake to make such omission, but it is one of those mistakes which can better be seen after a few years' experience than before.

Mr. Washington Townsend, a distinguished member of this House in the Forty-fourth Congress, made a speech in reply to a charge of that character, and I cannot do better than send to the Clerk's desk and ask that there be read two paragraphs of that speech which I have marked in pencil.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to detain the House at this late hour of the afternoon, but as the complaint appears to be that by legislation of Congress the silver dollar was demonetized, and as the charge has been made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that it was done surreptitiously and perpetrated an injustice and a fraud upon the people, I wish to say to the House that I have here in my hand the whole proceedings from the conception of the idea of the demonetization of the silver dollar down to the final consummation in the law of 1873.

In the report which was made by Mr. J. J. Knox, now the Comptroller of the Currency, in 1870, with regard to the reorganization of the Mint and the draught of a bill which accompanied it, the silver dollar of 412½ grains was left entirely out. In the correspondence which took place between the Treasury Department and the officers of the Mint and scientific men all over the country it was the almost unanimous conclusion of those learned men, who had bestowed attention on the subject, that the dollar of 412½ grains should be omitted. In the session of 1871, as has already been stated, my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] offered a bill in which that dollar was not mentioned at all. It is No. 5 of the first session of the Forty-second Congress. It was reported again by Mr. KELLEY on January 9, 1872, with his recommendation that it do pass, and was debated by him and Potter, GARFIELD, Holman, and others. On the next day the consideration of it was resumed, and my colleague explained the bill and it was recommitted. It was reported back by Mr. Hooper as bill No. 1427 on the 9th of February having in it a subsidiary dollar of 384 grains and divisions thereof, but omitting the old dollar of 412½ grains and providing that no coins of gold, silver, or minor coinage other than those of the denominations, standards, and weights therein set forth should be coined. Mr. Hooper explained it in ten columns of the Globe, and stated specifically that the reason the dollar was reduced to 384 grains was that the silver dollar was worth one hundred and three cents in gold and was exported and we could not keep it here. My colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] then chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, gave most substantial reasons for the omission of the old dollar, the sound policy of which I most heartily indorse, especially his observations on the double standard.

* * * * * * *

The debate occupied nearly forty columns of the Globe, so that there was no smuggling about it; but the attention was called to the change in the silver dollar and its reduction to a subsidiary coin. (See Globe, volume 89, pages 2304 to 2317.)

Later in the session (May 27) Mr. Hooper reported a substitute, (No. 2934,) which, so far as the silver dollar was concerned, was precisely similar to the preceding one, all of them ignoring the old dollar and restricting the legal tender of the subsidiary coins to $5. That bill was debated by Messrs. Hooper, Brooks, Holman, Farnsworth, Sargent, Kerr, and McNeely.

Mr. McNeely was a member of the Committee on Coinage, and said:

"As a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, having carefully examined every section and line of this bill, and generally well understanding the subject before us, I am satisfied that the bill ought to pass. It was thoroughly investigated by everybody who felt an interest in it, and passed, as has been stated, by a vote of 110 to 13."

It was twenty-two times before the House and Senate, and occupied over thirty-nine columns of the Globe in its discussion.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration proposes to convert 412½ grains of silver bullion into a currency dollar which shall be receivable for all public dues, including duties on imports, and made a part of the lawful money reserve which is held by national banks. This is the widest departure from a sound currency ever proposed in the Congress of the United States. Should the bill become a law, it would benefit no one, except the possessors of silver bullion. It would injure every other man, and every branch of business in the country.

It would be better known if it were entitled "A bill to increase the price of silver bullion." It can have no effect upon the other products, or the industries of the country, except as they may be embarrassed and injured by a complete destruction of the standard of values. All foreign silver, whether in coin or not, is but bullion in this country, and 412½ grains of it is worth in the market of the world only eighty-five cents; yet by this bill we propose to say to everybody in this or any other country, "Bring your silver here, coin or bullion, and we will issue you a dollar for every 412½ grains." What vein of prosperity have we encountered that enables us to be so liberal? Or what necessity exists there which would justify a step so radical? Are we so much in want of more money for a circulating medium that we can afford to issue paper and sell it at 15 per cent. discount?

Free coinage is also provided for in this bill. That is essential to the consummation of this gigantic swindle perpetrated in the interests of bullionists upon the people and business of the whole country. Free coinage of the silver dollar, now authorized by law, means to give to the owners of bullion the 15 per cent. profit now realized by the Government on every dollar coined at the mints. Not content with turning over and giving to them this profit on the amount actually coined, the bill goes further and proposes to give them a like advantage upon all the bullion they can bring and deposit in the United States Treasury. With this premium offered, all the silver at home and abroad would find its way to our Treasury for deposit; our Treasury and sub-treasury buildings would soon be converted into warehouses filled with merchandise in the form of silver bullion.

For all this we propose to issue certificates of deposit, at the rate of $1 for every eighty-five cents in value, and upon such paper, representing merchandise, we are to conduct the business of the country. If the full value of a dollar were thus deposited there would be some appearance of honest dealing in the transaction, as the bullion could be drawn and converted into money, but to issue a certificate of $1 for eighty-five cents in value and force it upon the people as a full dollar is a swindle of the grossest kind.

These certificates, if issued, would not be money. We might as well say our warehouse receipts for wheat in store at the West shall be used as money, and with much greater propriety, for there would be no pretense of using them for more than their real value.

I am not opposed to silver, or the double standard of money; I am in favor of it, and of the silver dollar as it now is; but I confess I would be better satisfied if it contained a dollar's worth of silver. If that were so, I would be in favor of free and unlimited coinage. I was on the committee in the Forty-fourth Congress, which reported the first bill restoring the silver dollar, and gave it my vote and consent, but not until I had made repeated efforts to increase its weight and value. I finally gave it my support, because the profit arising from coining 412½ grains of silver into a dollar would belong to the United States and be shared by all the people alike, but when it is proposed to turn that profit from the Government into the pockets of the bullionist, brokers, and men of capital, who can deal in silver, giving to them 15 per cent. profit on all the silver bullion and foreign coin they are able to gather up and deposit in the Treasury, I protest against it.

Since I have been here I have heard much from the democratic side of the Chamber against class legislation. Never was a more flagrant step in the interests of a class than is proposed by this bill. Bullion is a mere product, an article of merchandise—nothing more, nothing less. It has a market value like other products. In this respect it is not unlike iron, lead, copper, wheat, or other staple. Unless it has passed through the mint it has none of the characteristics of money. Why, then, should we give to the holders of silver bullion, foreign or domestic, 15 per cent. above the market value for all their products? Would not that be class legislation of the worst kind?

Is there any reason for enacting a law that $850 invested in silver shall be worth and computed as much in ordinary business transactions as $1,000 invested in any of the other products I have named? If it were proposed to add this profit to the productions of our own mines and no other, as provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. BELFORD,] it would be more tenable. But that could not be justified upon principle. The gratuity, however, is to extend to the productions of all countries.

The passage of this bill can add no material wealth to the country. Nothing will be created by it. It only gives to him who is so fortunate as to have a quantity of silver bullion the right to use it in the discharge of obligations due to the Government with 15 per cent. premium added, or such difference as there may be between the value of 412½ grains of silver and one dollar. Being receivable for public dues it will take the place of a circulating medium to a large extent among the people. The $240,000,000 revenue now collected annually into the Treasury would be paid in these certificates, which would cost the depositor only $204,000,000, a loss to the Treasury of $36,000,000 annually. These certificates could not be used, however, in the discharge of obligations against the Government. They could not be a legal tender to individuals. It is not in the power of Congress to make them such. The Government can receive no advantage by this law. The loss will be very great to the many, the advantage to the few. Whenever a law is enacted in the interests of a part, giving them a pecuniary advantage, we thereby levy that advantage upon all the others, and compel them to make it good. The gain to one is just so much loss to the others. If, then, we give these bullion dealers a profit we take just that amount from the products of others.

Mr. Speaker, what is the occasion for such a law? Why destroy the money standard of the country and substitute therefor an uncertain, fluctuating medium, based upon an article of merchandise, debased at that. Contrary to the predictions of these very men who are forcing upon the country this reckless scheme, resumption has become a success, and the entire volume of currency now in circulation is at par with gold coin, something which has never existed before in this country since we have used a paper medium. Confidence has to some extent been restored. Business is beginning to take shape and revive. Interest upon capital will grow less as the stability of investments are increased.

But what do we now see? The democratic party, controlling the Congress under the financial nanagement of the greenback element, are threatening the country with a policy which will destroy all hope of prosperity in business circles.

These constant efforts to obtain money without earning or giving an equivalent for it make honest men tremble, and capital is forced to seek investment with the Government at 4 per cent. interest rather than take chances in any of our industries. A long-time security is preferred, with a view to bridge over the period of fanaticism. What is to be gained by this bill? Is free coinage so desirable that we can afford to discriminate so largely in favor of every one who will bring to the mint material for coinage when the Government can purchase, and does now purchase without the least difficulty, a supply to the fullest capacity of our mints, reserving to itself the profits? What is to be gained by the lodgment of bullion in the vaults of the Treasury? Do men suppose the people will sustain such a departure from every principle of sound financiering and from the standard of money fixed by our fathers in the Constitution? The Supreme Court have defined a dollar to be a certain weight and fineness of gold or silver coined in the mints with the stamp of the United States upon it. This is the only dollar which can be issued and upheld in the time of peace. Without these characteristics it cannot be recognized as money. A shower of bullion certificates upon the country in the manner provided in this bill can do no good. It could not be in the interests of the debtor class, for these certificates cannot be made available for the payment of debts except to the United States. It would not help the poor, for they have neither foreign coin nor bullion to convert into certificates. It would not reward labor by paying it eighty-five cents for a dollar.

No class of people would be so cheated and swindled as the laboring class by the use of these certificates in the place of money. The merchant can adjust his prices with those of other countries; so will the producer to a large extent. But he, too, will suffer. The prices of exportable products are fixed in foreign countries; even the price of the surplus which is shipped abroad establishes the price of that which is consumed at home. Purchases of produce are made from first hands in the debased currency wherever there is any, but the shipper receives from his consignee payment in coin or its equivalent. A depreciated currency is always kept in circulation among the common people and the laboring classes, while the capitalist transacts his business with exchange upon a gold basis. The prices fixed in coin are thus paid out to the producer and laborer in a debased currency and they sustain the loss.

The silver dollar which is now being coined is put into circulation with great difficulty. If paid out at the Treasury it is returned at once. Two-thirds of all that has been coined lies in the vaults of the Government. It is not worth a full dollar, and can pass as such only by force of law, which makes it a legal tender. Bullion certificates would be wanting in this: they would pass to a heavy discount and become the trading stock of bankers and brokers. Do we need more money for the transaction of business? Do the products of the West bring less because there is not sufficient money to move them to the seaboard with ease? Are the avenues of trade blocked and the merchant and shipper embarrassed by the want of money? If any one believes this let him look at facts and witness the large volume of money lying unemployed in the cities. We have a paper currency now in circulation amounting to $688,000,000, besides the gold and silver coin brought into use by resumption. France has a paper currency of $445,000,000, Great Britain only $231,000,000, and Germany $152,000,000. We have more than France and Great Britain together, more than double that of Great Britain and Germany together, and lack only $140,000,000 of having as much as all these countries. France has more coin than we, but it lies mostly in bank for the redemption of the currency, and must be drawn out for no other purpose, and the volume of money in circulation cannot be increased.

If the people of these countries can transact business with a medium so much less than ours with a success which has made them distinguished, cannot we transact our business with the money which we have? No better evidence is needed of the great volume of money unemployed in this country than the recent subscriptions to the 4 per loan, involving transactions of over $100,000,000 in a single day. It is idle to spend our time in trying to create more money, and it is worse than idle to attempt to manufacture a debased substitute. Let us rather turn our attention to the production of something which will add to our real wealth. Let us consume less time in trying to obtain money before it is earned and more time in producing something which can be exchanged for it. In this lies the great error of those constantly tinkering with the currency. Turn it over and change it as often as we may, these finance doctors will be met by the irresistible laws of trade, and they cannot get money honestly unless they earn or give an equivalent for it.

If we would serve our country best, we would leave undisturbed the question of finance. The people desire it; business of every kind demands it. The money which we already have is ample, and it is as good as the world produces. We have paper money in abundance and coin enough to make sure its redemption. No nation in the world has a safer, sounder, or more convenient monetary system than we have. Why not, then, let it rest? Instead of increasing the volume of idle money, we need continued confidence in that which we have. The road to prosperity is not one of more money, but it is the one which will give employ to the money which we now have.

If we would serve our country, let us open the avenues of trade, encourage manufacturing, emigration, and settlement and improvement of the public lands. Turn our attention to these and the labor and industries of the country, and we will find capital and money in large quantities coming to our aid for investment.

There is another feature of this bill which illustrates the reckless policy which is being pressed forward. If it were the work of a single member we might think it less characteristic, but it has the sanction of a committee and the usual prestige which attaches thereto.

The clause to which I invite attention provides that these bullion certificates "may be computed as part of the lawful money reserve of national banks."

What is this lawful money reserve? It is a fund held for the protection of bill-holders. The banks are required by law to keep it at all times for the redemption of their circulating notes. It must be a legal tender or it would not be available for that purpose. Every one knows, sir, that neither bullion nor these certificates can be made a legal tender. To present to a bank its bills, worth par in gold coin, and receive in exchange or in redemption of the bills presented a certificate of deposit representing eighty-five cents of merchandise, would be such a protection to bill-holders as would disgrace any system of banking in the world. It would be a mockery, a sham; and if this proposition should come from the banks it would condemn them forever.

Another inconsistency equally great but more destructive of the public interests is found in the bill. It is that which obliges the Government to receive these certificates for all public dues, taxes, or revenues, while not a single dollar can be used for the payment or discharge of liabilities against the Government. It would be unwise indeed to compel the Government to receive its taxes in a fund which it could not in turn use for its own purposes. Such certificates would cost the holder but little more than eighty-five cents on the dollar. The entire receipts of the Treasury would soon be of this kind of paper, and we should be compelled to purchase at large expense a fund for the liquidation of our current expenses, to meet our bonds and checks, as well as obligations to the Army and Navy. Nothing can be available for any of these purposes except a legal tender. A sound policy would require that the Government should collect its revenues in a fund that would be available for the liquidation of its own liabilities; something in which it could meet its current expenses and pay off its debts. But under this bill its receipts would be largely of a fund that could in no way be used for that purpose. Is this to be the financial policy of the party now assuming control of the Government? Is this the relief about which our friends on the other side of the Chamber talk so much?

This seems to have become the doctrine of the party, once so famous for its adherence to the constitutional dollar, degenerated from the policy of Jackson to the new light and dispensation of the greenback element. The compact between the democratic and national party is too apparent. The one is to dictate the political, the other the financial policy of the Government in the future. The one is to re-establish the authority of the States over the Federal Government. The other to overturn and destroy the whole system of finance, which has become settled and so successfully as to attract the admiration of the whole world. No doubt can be entertained but if this bill shall become a law it will be the most radical as well as the most useless change ever adopted in any country. But something must be done at this extra session to avert public attention and arrest the censure which is sure to fall upon those who are responsible for its continuance. But in this they will fail. In these efforts to appease the wrath of the people a discordant element is being injected into the business circles which will recoil upon the perpetrators with an effect never hitherto witnessed. Whoever undertakes to overthrow and depart from the standard of money established by the Constitution of our fathers, and substitute a plan so wild and visionary as the one under consideration will be swept into the whirlpool of oblivion.

Mr. Speaker, thus far I have discussed these questions upon the principle of maintaining a bi-standard of money. The bill under consideration, as well as the law as it now stands, is based upon that standard. I am in favor of retaining both gold and silver in circulation. Both metals are produced in large quantities in the mines of our own country, and it will promote our prosperity to continue their use.

During the fiscal year 1878, the gold production of the United States was $47,226,000; silver, $46,726,000. The coinage was $52,798,000 of gold and $28,290,000 of silver; a total of $81,098,000.

The most careful estimates place the amount of gold coin and bullion in the United States at the end of the last fiscal year as follows: gold, $244,000,000; silver, $88,000,000; total, $332,000,000—making an increase of gold and silver over the fiscal year preceding of $89,000,000. On the 1st of October last the Director of the Mint estimated the amount of gold and silver in the United States to have reached $358,000,000. With so much gold and silver we cannot afford to discard either as a standard, nor adopt any money system which will drive either from the country. Both should be retained and used in the ordinary channels of business, and care should be taken, too, that we do not depart from them; but as we have after eighteen years' wandering from the true standard of money successfully returned, we should now adhere to it.

The great difficulty, however, in preserving the bimetal standard arises from the fact that the real value of one is much greater than that of the other. The bill under consideration fixes the weight of the gold or unit dollar at 25.8 grains, the same as it is now and has been for many years, while that of silver is fixed at 412½ grains. The difference in their bullion value, as I have already stated, is about 15 per cent. With this difference it is not easy to see how both can be successfully retained in circulation with free and unlimited coinage. If the quantity of silver be very largely increased and forced into circulation, either the silver coin will pass to a discount and gold assert its superiority as the real standard, or silver will assume the unit and gold pass to a premium. If silver becomes the standard the gold coin will be sent abroad to be exchanged for foreign silver, and we shall soon find ourselves using silver, and nothing else, in these United States for a standard, and the bimetal system will be abandoned.

But it is said the people are involved in debt, and that the gold dollar is worth too much or has really increased in value since these debts were contracted, and that it is hard for us to discharge and pay our debts with the great depression in the prices of property. That a large portion of the debts of the people was contracted while prices were much greater than at the present time, no one can deny; but that gold is really higher is a much disputed question. While it is conceded that silver has sunk in value since it has been dropped as a standard in so many parts of the world—nor does its remonetization with us seem to increase its value—to relieve the debtor class we must lower the standard of money and make the unit dollar worthless. But this bill does not propose to do that. It retains the weight and standard of the gold dollar as it now is. If we would reduce and bring it down to the value of a silver dollar, gold should be recoined at a standard not exceeding 22.5 grains, instead of 25.8 grains as provided in the bill. If it be the object of free coinage to enhance the value of silver, if it be expected that unlimited coinage will create such a demand for silver bullion as to increase its value to that of gold, then the value of the standard dollar, whether it be gold or silver, will be retained, and the debtor class will in no way be benefited. Although those who favor the passage of this bill urge that it will bring relief to the people by lowering the real value of the dollar and thereby increase the nominal value of property, yet at the same time they advocate free coinage as tending to advance silver bullion to the value of gold. Hence, it will be seen, this legislation will not in the least redound to the benefit of the debtor class, neither to the laborer nor the producer; but, as I said in the beginning, it will help only those who are the possessors of silver bullion by advancing its price.

It cannot help the debtor class, for the object and effect of the bill is to enhance the value of silver. Instead of bringing it down, the standard of values is to be and is retained by the continuance of the gold dollar at its full weight, and all pretense that this proposed legislation is in the interest of the debtor class is without foundation.

If free coinage be adopted, and the volume of silver be largely increased, a struggle must follow between the gold and silver coin as to which shall become the standard. The difference in value between the two is irreconcilable unless we increase the weight of one or diminish that of the other. With the coinage of silver without limit and the profit realized by the bullionists instead of the Government a conflict will arise that will unsettle business, destroy confidence, and throw the entire currency, coin and bullion, into the hands of brokers and speculators. Discounts will be submitted to on the one hand and premiums enjoyed upon the other. The money-changers will find their occupation renewed, and they will grow rich again out of the labor and productions of the people.

What, then, is the remedy? How shall we avert the danger that threatens us? First of all, let the gold, silver, and currency alone; acknowledge that resumption is a fact. We cannot change the gold dollar, for it is in harmony with other nations. Let specie remain as a basis. Require that all the currency, or that which assumes to circulate as such, shall be convertible into coin. Let the coinage of the silver dollar remain limited to $4,000,000 a month, as it now is, so that we may find employment and use for that which is coined, and avoid a conflict between it and gold, which I fear will arise if overstocked with silver. The capacity of the mints and the coinage which is now carried on is equal to the production of the American mines, while all the profits are enjoyed by the General Government. It becomes our duty, then, to defeat the passage of this bill, and let the silver already coined find circulation, if it can. If more can be used, Congress can enlarge the amount of coinage or remove the restriction altogether. But while there exists a wide margin between bullion and coin, a large profit for the mintage, that profit should be reserved to the Treasury. In other words, while the stamp of the United States placed upon the silver dollar and the legal-tender quality provided for it by law add to the bullion a difference of 10 to 15 per cent., that difference or profit should inure to the benefit of the whole people, as it now does, instead of to the bullionists and brokers.

Mr. Speaker, if I am wrong in my views of coinage and the effect of it upon the people I shall regret it. My sympathies are all with the laboring and producing classes. Whatever will aid them, in my judgment, will redound to the prosperity of the whole country; whatever is to their disadvantage will recoil upon us all; and I do not believe we can serve them better than to preserve their money upon a sound basis.

If our friends on the other side of the Chamber are sincere, and desire for the benefit of the debtor class to reduce the standard of the dollar, why do they not propose the remedy at once by reducing the weight and value of the gold and make it correspond to the silver dollar? Free coinage would then find no opposition, but be favored by all. This they understand, however, would place our standard below that of other nations and our money at a discount with them; and as our currency is now equivalent to coin, it would also take largely from its purchasing power, and the loss to the holders of $688,000,000 of currency would be very great. They know, then, it is utterly impossible to make such reduction and preserve our consistency and standing at home and abroad. Under these false pretenses they here and elsewhere proclaim that they are relieving the masses of the people, the laborer, the poor man, and the debtor, without suggesting any step whatever to bring the debtor and the creditor nearer together or which will provide a better reward for labor or the fruits of industry. We conclude, then, as before, that the country will be best served by letting the money alone.

Mr. Speaker, while passing the Treasury building this morning, I witnessed a long file of the people, reaching out to the street, testifying to the credit and good financial management of this Government. Each one, as he passed along, was investing his savings in 4 per cent. certificates. I could not but mark the contrast between this and the close of the democratic administrations which were terminated by the reign of Mr. Buchanan. At that time in many instances the Government was obliged to pay 12 per cent. interest on its securities, while England is now sending us her gold coin, adding a premium to our 4 per cent. obligations. Yet, in the face of these facts, the charge is continuously made that the financial policy of the republican party has ruined the country. The difference between the two parties is this: the one asserts the authority of the National Government wherever permitted by the Constitution; this strengthens its credit and gives the people confidence; while the other strikes down the Federal arm wherever they can, vests the power in the States, which weakens the General Government.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Mr. Speaker, as we are discussing this bill under the five-minute rule, I will proceed directly to the merits of this amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] The misery that has been brought upon this country by the financial legislation of the last fifteen years, and which legislation has been entirely in the interest of the bondholder, has been so thoroughly discussed that I will not trespass upon the time of this House in referring to it. The masses demand relief, relief from the burdens of taxation and the unjust legislation which is making them poorer every day, while it is adding to the wealth of the bondholders. Silver has been demonetized by fraud, so well concealed that not even the members of the committee on this floor who reported the bill under which it was done can give any satisfactory account of it or fix the guilt upon the perpetrator, as appears from the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] delivered in this House May 10, 1879, and which I refer to.

The currency has been contracted to such an extent as to more than double the purchasing power of money, thus causing a general shrinkage in value all over the country. It is well understood by the people. It has brought bankruptcy and ruin upon the country. The republican party have had the power in every branch of the Government, but instead of giving relief they have added to the burdens of the people, and by their votes at this session have shown that they intend to oppose every measure of financial relief. The people are looking to us to give them some relief, and it is the duty of the democrats upon this floor to make the attempt, and if it is not successful let the masses know where the responsibility rests. Let the President give us another veto if he means to disregard the right of the people to financial relief which is just and proper. Let the people know who is responsible. Let us do our duty as democrats on this floor.

Now, what is demanded? We want free and unrestricted coinage of silver and to make it a legal tender for all amounts and all debts; that is the grand object of this bill. But that is not all the people need. The great question is, to put a stop to the interest-bearing debt, to pay off the bonds, and to give to us an increase of currency. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas has for its object these ends. It not only enables us to pay off the debt to a large extent, by purchasing silver bullion, coining it into money, and paying for it in greenbacks, and appropriating that silver to the payment of the bonds that are payable in coin, but it puts the greenbacks in circulation which are paid for the silver bullion. Thus it increases the circulation very largely while at the same time it extinguishes the bonded indebtedness of the country and stops the interest to the amount of many millions of dollars. I regard this amendment as important as the bill itself, and the author of this amendment is entitled to the gratitude of the suffering masses. It is practicable, and meets and avoids the objection urged by some, that the bonds cannot be paid in greenbacks, and at the same time it gives to the country a large increase in the volume of greenback currency.

I hope this amendment will be adopted, and then let us substitute greenbacks for the national-bank currency, and pay off the bonds upon which they are founded or abolish the banks themselves, which are dangerous to civil liberty, wielding almost a controlling power over this Government already. Then let us tax the incomes of these bondholders, as we attempted the other day, if we cannot tax the bonds themselves, and make the bondholders bear their proportion of the enormous expenditures of this Government; make the taxes equal and uniform—"equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none." Then we will have done something in the way of substantial relief for the people of the country. And why, Mr. Speaker, should we not do this?

The United States bonds were originally payable in currency. They were put upon the market and sold at from forty to sixty cents on the dollar. One would have supposed when they went up to par it would have satisfied the avarice of the bondholders; but it did not. In violation of the rights of the American people a republican Congress passed the act of March 18, 1869, making these very bonds payable in coin, and to add to this stupendous fraud they demonetized silver, increasing the burden of taxation millions of dollars and depreciating the value of labor and property all over the country by contracting the currency, all in the interest of the bondholders and to increase their wealth at the expense of the farmers, laborers, and all other producing classes—increasing the burden by taking away from the people one of the means of payment, silver coin.

And now, to-day, when we propose to pay these bonds off in silver coin, we are met by the opposition of that same party, voting on every proposition in the interest of the bondholding aristocracy of the country, here and in Europe, and against the interest of the toiling masses of the people, under the false cry that they want "honest money."

Why, Mr. Speaker, who first created the greenback currency and declared it a legal tender, with unjust exceptions in favor of the bondholders and the Government? It was the republican party. They not only did that, but forced democrats to take it, at the point of the bayonet and under threats of guard-houses, in Kentucky, and I suppose elsewhere. But they did not even stop there. They so organized the Supreme Court as to procure a decision that greenbacks were lawful and constitutional money and that Congress had a right to make them a legal tender. Now, if they are good enough for the laboring-man, if they are good enough for the farmer, they are good enough for the bondholder; and I would like to see every bond paid in greenbacks. But the representatives of these bondholders on this floor are not even willing to take silver coin; but, sir, the people will force them to take it, or fare worse. The American people will not stand this unjust discrimination in favor of the bondholder much longer. They will have a uniform currency, receivable for all dues, public and private, and uniform and equal taxation; and it is just as certain as that I stand upon this floor. It is the will of the people, and in a republican government, vox populi vox Dei.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I desired to express my views upon this bill when it was under discussion generally in Committee of the Whole, but I was unable to get the opportunity at that time to do so. I am now given but five minutes, and in that time I am, as a matter of course, unable to make any argument. I shall therefore satisfy myself with a statement of a few facts which I believe ought to control the action of every honest man on this bill.

Sir, I am an earnest, conscientious, uncompromising advocate of bimetallic money, and I believe in international free coinage on a common basis. I therefore speak as a friend of silver money, and I gave evidence of that friendship last year by voting for the bill which was passed by the Forty-fifth Congress over the veto of a republican President. I am still of the same opinion which led me then to vote as I did, and were I to be called upon again under like circumstances to vote upon that bill I should vote as I did then. I was, however, in that Congress opposed to the original Bland bill, and then denounced it as a cheat and fraud upon the people. I conclude that there is little difference between the effects likely to result from that bill and the one now before us. In some respects I consider this worse than that, and certainly since the resumption of specie payments and in view of present prospects for international action at no distant day, it is more untimely and less excusable.

I deny the possibility in the nature of things of the existence of a double metallic standard of money except it be based upon a ratio ascertained in the market overt of the world by the commercial value of the two metals as bullion. Gold and silver are commodities of universal and sempiternal value to man. They have a natural value as commodities which may be enhanced by their legalized use as money. If such artificial use as money be withheld or withdrawn their commercial value will be somewhat affected to their detriment; if having been withdrawn, this use be again restored to them, I therefore conclude that their commercial value would be somewhat enhanced. And so of either one of them. The law cannot create this value; it can, however, to some extent extend their use and increase the demand for both or either of them, and to that extent may affect their value as commodities. In the end the value as bullion must regulate their relative value as money.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, does not proceed upon that basis. It utterly ignores these principles and cannot stand the test of reason and common sense. It is absurd in this light, and must be condemned. It declares in favor of two money units, a gold and silver unit; and in the face of all experience, in the face of all intelligent opinion which may be ascertained from the history of nations, it refuses to recognize that law which will control this subject, whether we recognize it or not, that in order to circulate side by side as money two metallic units must be of equal commercial value. They must be interconvertible at par, exchangeable without loss, and this not only in one country but alike so in and between all nations. Otherwise the more valuable takes its flight from the country which attempts to depreciate it, and the less valuable reigns sole money-king therein. "Fiat" cannot avert this result; hue and cry cannot suspend this law; these come and reign in spite of all clamor of demagogues, all fine-spun theories of pamphleteers, all denunciation of the "money power" by ambitious political Dennis Kearneys, and it is well they do. If human law could wholly regulate this subject I should, in view of the signs of these times, despair of any possible stability of value either for labor or for capital.

Therefore the inevitable result of this bill enacted into law in this country would be to banish all the gold we have and reduce us to a depreciated and uncertain standard of silver alone. Instead of establishing bimetallism it defeats it absolutely, and this at a time when, if we have patience, the great commercial powers must soon unite with us in restoring silver to full use and free coinage as money. Believing this, Mr. Speaker, it is folly and financial suicide, in my judgment, for us to pass this bill at this time.

But, sir, what is the sophistry, called argument, by which gentlemen seek to induce us to enact this bill into law? The argument in substance is this: that the present depreciation of silver is caused by demonetization, by increased production, and by oversupply in the market of the commercial world. There is a difference between two classes in this respect. Some deny the operation of the latter causes and charge the whole effect to demonetization. I go with them to some extent in that direction. I have said that both metals have a natural as well as a legalized value, and that legislative action or non-action does have some effect upon their commercial or bullion value I will concede.

In 1867 the international conference at Paris to which twenty nations, including the greatest commercial countries of Europe and the United States, sent delegates, declared almost unanimously for a single gold standard. Since that time silver has been remitted to an inferior, subsidiary place as "the small change of trade," substantially in all of those countries; for example, say in fifteen nations. The price of silver, which was 3½ per cent. above par in gold before this war of demonetization began, has in the mean time fallen so fast and so far that it is now 15 per cent. below par, and a silver dollar is worth but eighty-five cents in gold. True the international conference of last year, in view of this astounding fact, declared almost as unanimously against the former decree and urged the continued use of silver as money of full value and admitted the desirability of full remonetization and free coinage.

But, sir, how stands the argument upon this bill. It is that by demonetization fifteen nations in this world, embracing the greatest commercial countries in Europe as well as our own, produced this fall in silver, and the reasoning urged to control our action here is that one of those nations may undo the work which the fifteen did and restore silver to its former value at once without the aid of any other; that fifteen nations have reduced the value of the silver dollar from one hundred cents to eighty-five, and that therefore one nation may restore it to its former standard of one hundred cents. This I consider the height of folly and of madness for this nation to undertake at this time. Whatever effect our sole action here might have upon the price of silver it is puerile and suicidal for us now to attempt to take the whole burden upon our shoulders at the cost of purchasing all the cast-off silver of the Old World, which is the greatest and most powerful ally we have in the endeavor to restore silver to full use and value as money.

Germany still has $75,000,000 of silver to sell. We produce nearly $40,000,000 a year ourselves. Our customs revenues the last year were rising $130,000,000. If this bill pass it is easy to see that more than enough silver would find its way to the Treasury within the next year to pay all the import duties fully. This is substantially a reduction of duties and the tariff 15 per cent. A merchant buying goods abroad, upon which, as the law now stands, a duty of $1,000 would be due in gold, could buy silver enough to pay it for $850. How this bill is to act as a further protective tariff, except for the bullionists, I am for the life of me unable to see. It will reduce the tariff, and necessarily force down wages of labor employed in manufacturing and mining, and thus oppress the very class in whose behalf it is urged as a measure of relief.

Under the bill of last year $31,000,000 have already been coined. About eight million are now in circulation—as many as were coined during the eighty years of the Republic prior to 1873. The rest are in the Treasury. This has been done on Government account, and the Government has the difference between the cost of the bullion and the amount coined—say $4,000,000—in hand for the benefit of all the people. Had this coinage been carried on under this bill, that difference would be in the coffers of bullion speculators, and not a cent of it in the pockets of laborers who own no bullion. If coinage of silver is to go on, in my judgment it should be on Government account so long as silver remains much below par.

Looking confidently to an early resumption of free coinage of silver by international agreement upon a common ratio, I do not greatly fear a continuance of coinage here on Government account. I am still firm in the belief that silver will ultimately rise enough to save the Government from any loss. I think it most probable that an international agreement for coinage upon the French ratio of 15½ to 1 will prevail in the near future, in which case we shall be largely gainers by continuing our coinage as at present. At all events we cannot suffer much by going on for another year when, if necessary, the coinage may be stopped.

Every sign in Europe gives evidence of rapid growth of public opinion in favor of full restoration of silver. Even in England, where silver was demonetized in 1822, this is true. The Liverpool Chamber of Commerce recently presented an address to the Queen's ministry from which I make the following extract:

1. That a fixed ratio between gold and silver, in conjunction with national freedom of mintage, and the recognition of the two metals as full legal-tender money, would, if adopted by the majority of the leading monetary powers, including England and India, be adequate to restore silver to its former international value as money.

2. That it is desirable that our government should adopt measures for securing an international agreement by which silver may be restored to its legitimate share in providing metallic currency sufficient for the wants of the world.

The reply of Lord Beaconsfield was, that the subject was engaging the serious attention of the government. This was in April last. One year ago such an address would have been out of the question, and had it been made such a reply would not have been contemplated. India, the greatest commercial dependency of that country, has ceased to absorb the surplus silver in the London market, has greatly increased home manufactures, and the exports from England to that country have fallen off greatly within the past two years. The par of exchange between them has been broken and English commerce and industry are fast falling into decay as the consequence. Prices measured in gold have fallen so much that at last English merchants and manufacturers are looking, as we have done, to demonetization of silver as the cause and to its full restoration as money as the remedy for their troubles.

One year ago in my remarks upon the silver bill, concerning this change in prices, I said:

In considering the question of the restoration of silver to its former relative value and place as international money, I deem it important to inquire whether the present difference in the purchasing power of silver and gold is wholly due to the depreciation of silver or partly to that and partly to the appreciation of gold. After the most careful reflection and after the fullest examination which I have been able to give the subject, I state it as my opinion, without any hesitation in my mind, that the change in the market value of these two metals is quite as much due to an increase in the purchasing value of gold in the market of the world as to a decrease in the value of silver. The value of neither of these metals is constant and unvarying. As money both are valuable to man only as means of purchasing what he desires for use or paying for something already purchased. They are commodities having a universal and sempiternal market, desirable to all men as measures and masters of all things, needful to man at any time or place. So to speak, they are the storehouses of the exchangeable labor of the past, from which the wants of the present, for which men are able to pay in the fruits of the labor of the present, may be supplied at will. Unlike paper currency, they are value, they do not simply represent it. But their value depends, as we have seen, upon the extent and limits of their use, their natural uses as commodities, their legal use as money.

Recent statistics of prices confirm and strengthen this view. But it does not follow by any means that it would be safe or best for us now to enter upon free coinage of silver upon the legal ratio of 16 to 1, while the commercial ratio is about 19 to 1. In 1793 the ratio was fixed in this country at 15 to 1. France established her mint rate at 15½ to 1 in 1803, and there it remains to-day. Our act of 1793 overvalued silver, and our gold coin was exported or melted nearly as fast as coined. Jefferson stopped the coinage of silver dollars soon after the French rate was established, and not one of them was coined thenceforth till 1836. In 1834 we reduced the gold dollar to almost precisely 1 to 16 of silver in weight. The bullion price was then a little above the French rate—15.7 to 1. Hence silver was undervalued by the act of 1834 and was exported or melted down. Even silver change would not circulate in this unfriendly companionship with gold and change became scarce.

In 1853 the smaller coins were reduced from the standard of 412½ grains to 384, and thereafter remained with us because they were less valuable as bullion than the gold coins and the silver dollars. Hence also the silver dollars, thus made more valuable than the gold coins, were useless as money, and we were practically in accord with England, using gold as our sole standard metallic money of full value, and silver only as change and a legal tender for $5.

The act of 1873, therefore, which has been so often denounced as a "crime" here and elsewhere, did not demonetize silver; that was done by the act of 1834, supplemented by the act of 1853, both passed by democratic Congresses and approved by democratic Presidents. The coinage of silver, on the contrary, was largely increased under the republican acts of 1873 and 1875, and whereas only about $2,000,000 a year of silver were coined for the eighty years prior to 1873, over $8,000,000 a year were coined after 1873 and up to 1878, and in 1878 we coined them at the rate of $24,000,000, and are doing so now.

Wherefore, then, this false cry of demagogues that the republican party has stricken down silver money? It is utterly without foundation in fact or justification under any view of the situation.

If this act shall be passed its first effect will be to destroy the usefulness of gold as a circulating money for the reasons given. Gresham's law that the cheaper money unit alone can circulate must rule from the hour of its passage. What will be the result upon the state of our currency?

The Director of the Mint estimated the gold in this country at $244,000,000 on the 30th of June, 1878. It cannot now be much less than $300,000,000. All this gold came to the surface with resumption of specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, and to-day it forms part of the current and useful money of the country as effectually as coin ever does or can when paper money is secure and convertible into it or its equivalent, as it is in our country to-day. Thus resumption brought a healthful and safe expansion of the currency as was intended and prophesied by the republican party.

If this law be passed silver alone of the two metallic moneys will circulate, and gold again sink out of sight and find a higher market. This must at first produce contraction and stringency in our currency. Our mints running to their full capacity cannot replace this gold with silver short of six years from this date. Oh, but the bullion certificates! Yes, the bullion certificates, if we are foolish enough to authorize their issue, will take the place of the gold, and the gold will go abroad to take the place of the silver bullion upon which they will be based.

We have to-day in this country fully this amount of money as good for every practical purpose as gold, namely:

Gold and silver	$400,000,000
Greenbacks and national-bank notes	675,000,000
Total	1,075,000,000
England had in 1875—
Paper money	230,000,000
Coin and bullion	700,000,000
Total	930,000,000
France, in 1877—
Paper	490,000,000
Coin	1,000,000,000
Total	1,490,000,000

In France commercial paper is almost unknown in business transactions. Nearly all payments are made in cash. Hence she must have a larger volume of money than is required in England and in this country, where all but about 5 per cent. of the business transactions among the people is done by checks, drafts, and bills of exchange. This measure is, in my judgment, fraught with great danger to the country, and I trust it will not become a law. Let us maintain for the present the status quo, and use every endeavor to secure international free coinage of silver as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, one thing the people of this country demand upon this question of excitement here in Congress as to what shall be the financial policy of this Government—they demand that we shall pass the appropriation bills, for the purpose of passing which we were called together, and let this law-ridden and tramp-ridden people be relieved from further excitement upon this question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILBER. Mr. Speaker, I have not taken up much of the time of this House in debate since I have been a member. I have met here day after day and listened to wild theories upon different subjects, and in my judgment as a business man this Congress has not done as much legislation that will benefit the country since the 18th day of March as any ten good business men could do in one-half a day. We have been making a complete waste of time, and the country knows it well. We were called together to pass the legislative and judicial and Army appropriation bills from money already raised and belonging to the people. It is our duty as agents for the people to pass those bills and go home and not linger here. No part of the country in my opinion desires any other legislation now. No petitioners have asked for any financial legislation this extra session.

I have been listening day after day to wild financial theories, much wilder than I expected. I have wondered many times if the inventors were in earnest. Some want to legislate to pay their own and everybody else's debts. They want hundreds of millions of money and short dollars at that.

Mr. Speaker, has it come to this, that in this glorious country where a young man with good habits and economy can start naked-handed and alone in life as he cannot in any other country on this globe, can pay his honest debts, if he lives within his means and exercises good judgment, can rise from his own energy to be one of the foremost men and best financiers in the community where he lives—that he is a fraud, especially if by honest industry he owns bonds? No, sir, that man will pay his debts, will pay his taxes, and not only educate his children but will pay the taxes to support and educate the children of others.

But on the contrary, if a young man starts in life, spends four dollars where he earns three, goes into wild and extravagant speculations, goes to capitalists to help him out, complains of high rates of interest, does not meet his engagements, disappoints every man he deals with, he at that juncture will find fault with every man that ever helped him, no matter if he has caused them heavy losses; he will want Congress or some one to legislate or help him out. You may legislate from now until doomsday for such business men and it will do them no good. There was a score of such stumping machines in my district last fall employed at $1 a day and expenses paid, and that was more than they were worth. This constant tinkering with the finances destroys the confidence of business men. It prevents them from embarking into business enterprises, deprives laborers of employment, and breaks up the industries of the country. I say again let us pass the appropriations and go home. Fixed principles of right, manliness, courage, energy, and grit are qualities where men are estimated for what they are actually worth. Sir, men go down or up according to their own will.

It is possible for those of the most humble birth to become the greatest in the land, and a large proportion of the leading minds in this country have achieved by honest merit the positions they occupy. The road to wealth in this country is plain. All summed up in a nutshell, if any man's expenses are more than his income, he is not making money. If his expenses are less than his income, he can lay up something. Those are the great principles we must adhere to for success; nothing else will do it, and what is true of an individual is as true with our Government. When we bought, as we were compelled to during the late war, more than we sold, we were running in debt; but, thank God, that day has passed. During ten months previous to November 30 last, the balance of trade in our favor from foreign nations was $287,000,000. The people of this country in that short time received the above amount or its equivalent, more than it paid out in gold. If we can continue in this we will not only be the richest, but the most powerful nation on the globe, and command the best credit. Give the country rest and peace that it may accomplish this desirable result.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to discuss this particular amendment. I am and have always been in favor of every honest proposition to supply to the people of this vast country the currency which their business and welfare demand. I desire, however, to take advantage of this brief opportunity to state in a general way the reasons which actuate me in giving to the pending bill my hearty support. An epitome of the financial legislation enacted by the republican party in the last sixteen years presents a singular and a heartless chapter of financial wrong.

In 1862 the bond system was inaugurated. In 1863 the national-bank system was adopted. By the legislation of that period the greenbacks were issued. The public debt, under the burdens of war, grew to over two billions. Of this immense sum three-fourths were represented by 5-20 bonds, payable in currency. In 1869 and 1870 the acts were passed which changed the nature of this immense debt and declared every dollar of it payable in coin. In 1873 silver was demonetized, and thus this debt was made payable in gold alone. In 1875 the resumption act was passed, and the work of destruction has been going on with relentless vigor. Sir, it is due to the truth of history to say that these measures exempting the bonds from taxation, creating national banks, declaring currency bonds payable in coin, striking down silver and forcing the resumption of specie payments without regard to the consequent forced contraction of the currency, destruction of values, and suffering of the people, were republican measures, matured and adopted by the republican party in the face and in spite of the opposition of the democratic vote in Congress. Thus, in 1869, the country had gold, silver, and greenbacks, in which to pay its great debt, though the greenbacks themselves were eventually redeemable.

But the payment of the 5-20 bonds in greenbacks according to the contract would have saved to the tax-payers of this country the interest on fifteen hundred millions of their debt, which they are now paying on the bonds issued in funding the five-twenties, and this, sir, without any violation on their part of a contract as binding on the bondholder as on them. It cannot be objected that this would have been excessive inflation, for the process could have been regulated by the demands of business. To put at rest this righteous agitation by the people to pay these bonds in currency as agreed in the start, John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, has announced to the country that the last dollar of that class of bonds has been taken up and destroyed, and another bond, bearing interest, exempt from taxation, and payable in coin, issued in its stead! And all this has been done under pretense of lessening the burdens of the people!

The act of 1873 demonetizing silver was in further pursuance of that republican policy which in effect struck down the means of payment in the hands of the people and enhanced their obligations in the hands of their holders. I do not agree exactly with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] in the statement that no man could be found who could be shown to be directly or indirectly the author of that act. The record of that period shows that while the act was pending and under consideration the question was asked by Mr. Merriam, of New York, whether it had been submitted to the then Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, a republican, having the bill in charge, answered that it had been submitted to that republican official, and he not only approved but strongly urged its passage. I believe, therefore, and avow here that the striking down of silver was a matured policy of the republican party to which—the evidences are abundant all around—they stoutly and persistently adhere.

No man can measure the damage to the business, the property, and the labor of this country which this mischievous system inflicted. Why, sir, it may be truly said that the resumption act of 1875 was at the bottom of the financial panic of 1873. Coming events cast their shadows before, and two years in advance is a short period of time for information to reach Wall street of the course of action to be adopted in Washington under the past republican financial rule. I have briefly run over these prime facts in the history of the financial legislation of the last sixteen years. The veto, which stands in the way of free elections, fair and impartial juries, and the inalienable right of a free people to vote untrammeled by bayonets and by bullets, stands ready to confront this bill. It was exercised to defeat the silver bill of the last Congress.

But these issues cannot die. When the democracy goes to the people demanding free elections, fair juries, the banishment of troops from the polls, and the restoration of an honest financial policy to the masses of this country, the rally will be great and the triumph grand. I am in favor of this bill because it represents one of these great issues; I am in favor of this bill because it restores to the people one of the means for the payment of their obligations, which was accepted as such by the holders of the obligations when they were created; I am in favor of this bill because it allows every holder of silver bullion to present it to the mints to have it coined free and returned to him in coin for general use. Our product of silver is from thirty to forty millions annually. This bill will therefore put that amount in circulation instead of hoarding it in the vaults. I am in favor of this bill because it will increase the currency of the country, contribute to the relief of its people, and vindicate, at least to some extent, the right of the masses to hold even the bondholder, in his assumed lordly estate, to the sacred obligation of his voluntary contract.

Mr. DWIGHT. I think there never was a measure (I charge no improper motives upon any man) so thoroughly and ingenuously misrepresented as this bill has been by those who advocate its passage in this House. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] has ingenuously sought to make us believe that this demonetizing act, which has been so much talked about, had been stealthily and surreptitiously passed. Now, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] has taken out of my mouth many things I had intended to say, and leaves but little for me to add. The truth is, as has been shown by him, and has often been shown here, that that act was passed after it had received full discussion for nearly three years in the public prints, in the two Houses of Congress, by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Mint, and by the whole country. No bill ever passed Congress but what might as properly be charged with having been surreptitiously passed.

Moreover, these gentlemen undertake to make us believe here, and I do not know but they have succeeded, some of them, in making themselves believe, that all the ills of this country have come from the passage of that act. Gentlemen talk about bonds. I want to tell them that they are the cause of those bonds. I can understand why gentlemen here and elsewhere may have serious objections to those bonds. Bonds, next to the Union soldiers, were the most troublesome things that certain men in this country during the entire period of the war had to encounter. But that those who were in favor of this Union should now stand up here and object to bonds is something that I cannot understand.

Mr. WARNER. We never were in favor of paying 412½ grains of silver for two hundred.

Mr. DWIGHT. I would be willing to discuss that question with the gentleman if I had time; but I have not in a five-minute speech. Now, I would be glad of the attention of my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to this: a great wrong, as they tell us, has been done the country. What is that wrong? From 1792, when the Mint was first put in operation, to 1835, while coinage was free and when everybody had the privilege of having coined all that he pleased, and when the bullion value of silver averaged during the entire period only about ninety-eight cents, there was coined 1,439,517 silver dollars. From 1835 to 1873, the time when this act was passed which has been so much misrepresented and complained of, there were coined 6,606,321 silver dollars. During the whole time from 1792 to 1873 there were coined 8,045,838 silver dollars. The act of 1834 changed the standard between gold and silver from 1 to 15 to 1 to 16. Experience had proved that it must be increased to make the silver dollar as valuable as the gold dollar. This readjustment kept the bullion value of the silver dollar constantly above the nominal value, from that period to 1873 the average value being 102.4. It will be observed that the average number yearly coined was less than $100,000 for a period of eighty-one years. From the passage of the act of February 12, 1873, to and including 1878, 35,959,360 trade-dollars were coined, which are nearly four and one-half times as many as all the standard dollars that had been coined in all the mints from the time the first dollar was coined to 1873.

There have also been coined of standard dollars since February 28, 1878, $31,248,700, of which there are still on hand $24,347,619. Although the Secretary of the Treasury has made a vigorous effort to get them into circulation, and paid express charges to any and everybody who would take them, he has only got $6,901,619 into circulation, which leaves all of those on hand as an unproductive investment.

Now, greenbackers and their democratic allies, which constitute the majorities in both Houses of Congress, advocates of inflation, irredeemable money, and repudiators, are all clamorously seeking to legislate for and control the vast business interests of this great country.

Mr. Speaker, before consenting to trust the interests of this Government and the people to a leadership that is the author of the pending bill and kindred measures which are being urged here, let us look briefly at some of the past financial record of the same leadership and its friends when it last had control of the affairs of the country.

On the 1st of July, 1857, the entire debt, after deducting the balance then in the Treasury, was	$11,350,272 63
On the 1st of July, 1858	38,512,461 56
On the 1st of July, 1859	58,415,423 79
On the 1st of July, 1860	61,140,497 00

From this exhibit it is apparent that under democratic management the public debt was increased in four years more than fivefold; and it should be added that the Government was unable to borrow money on its bonds at a rate of interest less than 10 to 12 per cent. Not a fortunate exhibit for a party which asks to be intrusted with the financial management of public affairs!

But, Mr. Speaker, I have not now the time nor is this the occasion to say more, except to add a few more statistics and observations, which I hope will illustrate the result of republican management of the credit and finances of the country compared with what our friends upon the other side have done and what is likely to result from their present efforts if they are permitted to carry their purposes into effect.

On the 4th of April, instant, British consuls were worth in the London market 97.9; United States 6 per cent. bonds, 104; United States 5 per cent. bonds, 107; United States 4½ per cent. bonds, 107½; United States 4 per cent. bonds, 101½.

On the same day, in the New York market, Louisiana sixes, sevens, and eights were worth 37 cents to 49⅝ cents; North Carolina sixes, 22½ cents; Tennessee sixes, 39½; Virginia sixes, 33½ to 40½ cents; Alabama six percents, funded, 6; railroad bonds guaranteed by State, 1 per cent; South Carolina sixes, 25 cents.

The careful observer will not fail to conclude, from what has been shown, that southern statesmanship and its management of public affairs, State and national, from its attack upon the Missouri compromise line in 1854 to this hour, has been one series of blunders and crimes. And yet that element is now controlling, through its majority in Congress, the legislative machinery of the country.

I trust, however, that the people have become alarmed, and will command a halt to such democratic greenback management as we have seen and is now being foreshadowed.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the measure now before the House, or rather as I understand the facts connected with and surrounding that part of this so-called silver bill, which is not already the law, both the friends and enemies of the measure are agreed that eighty-five cents' worth of silver bullion is made equal by its provisions to a dollar of one hundred cents in value whenever it becomes the law. Now, this process of increasing the value of silver is all for the benefit of the bullion-holder—for the money-king! It does not benefit the people or the Government, but increases the wealth of the mine-owner and speculator in bullion. Eighty-five cents' worth of silver in its uncoined state is made by this bill worth one dollar to the bullionite; it is made worth as much as a gold or a "greenback" dollar; but the moment it passes from the hand of the bullionite this equality of value ceases and it becomes depreciated to eighty-five cents.

The effect of this bill, if it becomes a law, will be to make the people—the tax-payers—pay fifteen cents premium to the bullionite for every eighty-five cents' worth of bullion he may present at the Government mints. Its practical effect will be to tax the people fifteen cents on every dollar for the benefit of the bullion-kings. Or, rather, eighty-five cents' worth of silver in the hands of the speculator is made a dollar by adding fifteen cents of the people's money to it, while the same amount in the hands of the Government, or common non-speculating citizen, workingman, or tradesman, is left worth but eighty-five cents. Mark you, the Government is not allowed, under this bill, anything except the poor privilege of coining silver dollars for the benefit of the bullion-holders. The coinage of dollars in which there is a large profit must be at the beck and nod of the individual money-kings, while the Government is still permitted to coin small change in which there is no profit, but large expense. The Government, the people, are excluded from coining dollars except for the bullionists. The farmers, mechanics, business men, and laborers must accept eighty-five cents for their "so-called" dollar's worth of bullion, but the money-king, under this bill, gets one hundred cents for the same amount; thus increasing the debt of the people fifteen cents on every dollar thus put in circulation. And this is called by the friends of the measure "free coinage." "Free" for what? "Free" from what? "Free" to whom? Why, "free" to the speculator? "Free" to the bonanza king! "Free" to the money-shark! "Free" to the man of bloated wealth, but oppressive to the poor and moneyless!

And, strange to say, our greenback friends who are so opposed to national banks are the warm advocates of this measure, notwithstanding it divests the Government of its sovereignty over the subject of money. It will be seen, as already intimated, that under this bill the Government will have no power to say when or how much money shall be coined. The Government is made a machine to be put in motion at the will of the bullion-holder. It can coin when the bullion-speculator says for it to coin. But when the mining-kings and capitalists see proper to combine in order to advance the price of silver and make money dear, then the mints of the nation are to be forced to lie idle and the currency suffer contraction—yes, "merciless contraction"—while the money-sharks are empowered to thus control the quality and quantity of our money. They are given the exclusive privilege of exchanging eighty-five cents' worth of silver for a dollar in gold or its equivalent.

And by this monopoly they will be able to make a run on the Treasury with greenbacks to be redeemed in gold, and thus force all the gold out of the Treasury with which to buy foreign silver to force into the Treasury through the mints at the value of $1 for eighty-five cents. Thus it will be seen that, silver being 15 per cent. cheaper than either gold or greenbacks, the two latter will disappear from circulation, leaving the former our only currency. The greenbacks will go into the Treasury as fast as put into circulation, in order to get gold, and the gold will go into foreign markets to buy silver, and our currency will be reduced to the amount of our silver coin alone. What more "merciless system of contraction" could be devised? The idea of crying "more money" and then voting to place it in the power of the bullion-kings to rule the money market, as they will, seems to me to be about as absurd as anything possible in human action. It is so consistent in its inconsistency as to make it a superlative paradox in economic philosophy.

The strongest argument against the present national-banking system is that growing out of the "free" feature, giving it within the possible power of the banking corporations to control the amount of our circulating currency. This bill may cripple the national-banking system; but in doing so it will operate to transfer this dangerous power to the hands of more dangerous combinations. It weakens an alleged tyrant over the currency to create a monarch more powerful and "merciless" in ruling our financial policy. I am not committed to the continuance of national banks. I am here to vote on the subject of substituting Treasury notes for national-bank notes according to my best judgment when the question shall be presented for my action. I am here committed to maintain gold, silver, and "greenbacks" as nearly equal as legislation can under the laws of human commerce and national enterprise. But let me say that if this bill shall become the law our "greenback" friends had as well "hang their harps on the willows," and will "look toward Jerusalem" in vain, for it will utterly preclude the Government from ever being able to substitute "Treasury notes" for the national-bank currency.

The bullion-kings will be masters of the situation if this bill shall become a law. They will "bull and bear" the money market to the accomplishment of their own financial designs against the poor people of the country, and amass still greater fortunes at the public expense, at the expense of the tax-payers of the nation.

Another and one of the main objections to this bill, which would be sufficient in the absence of others to control my vote against it, consists in the fact that in my judgment the country is now gradually recovering its wonted prosperity under our present financial policy. In my opinion, the country needs repose and a cessation of financial agitation.

What the currency wants is to be "let alone," at least until our present system of resumption is fairly tested. If prosperity is to be reached by means of further legislation, and not through our present policy, next winter will be a much more appropriate time than at this extra session to reopen the question for deliberate and full consideration and action by Congress and the Executive. And while I shall vote against this bill for the reasons stated, I shall hold myself ready at all times to vote for any reasonable and just measure to make and maintain silver equal to any and all other kinds of money whenever it is presented under circumstances for calm discussion and deliberate consideration.

And still another reason why I cannot vote for the present bill is its manifest tendency to prevent European nations, which have demonetized silver, from remonetizing it, as they are on the eve of doing. There is certainly a reaction in favor of silver among foreign countries. Its demonetization by a majority of the European governments has not only struck a severe blow to our commerce, but also to the commerce of Europe, and if we permit our present laws to remain silver will be remonetized throughout all civilized countries, in order to revive their waning commerce. We have already placed ourselves right by restoring the "dollar of our daddies," but if we open up a market here for all the bullion of the Old World, to come into competition, through the manipulations of the bullion-brokers and money-kings, with our American silver, foreign silver will flow in and break down our own silver interests in the West, and at the same time, by the influences already explained, cause gold to "take the wings of the morning," as it were, "and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth;" at least pass beyond our commercial control.

As a friend of silver, and of the so-called "common people of this country," I am constrained to vote against this measure in the garb in which it has been presented. But if you will strike out the third section and insert a provision like the one of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] voted on by the House yesterday, by which the Government and the people make the profit of fifteen cents on the dollar by the coinage instead of giving it to the bloated silver-king, and let the Government continue to control its own coinage operations, I will give the measure my support; otherwise I cannot; otherwise I will not. On this question in this shape I am willing to go before the country and my constituents, trusting in the good sense and patriotism of the people, the great body of whom are intelligent and honest, without regard to their party predilections.

Mr. WARNER. I rise now to call for the previous question upon the pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that any other gentleman desires to be heard upon it.

Mr. WARNER. Before the vote is taken, then, I wish to say a single word. The purpose of this bill is simply to so amend the Revised Statutes as to replace silver exactly where it stood under the laws of the United States from 1792 down to 1873; nothing else is proposed in this bill, nothing else aimed at.

We claim that by the act of 1873 gold was increased in value and silver decreased in value; and that justice to the whole people of the country requires that that wrong be righted. That is the whole aim of this bill; not to issue legal-tender notes or to enter into questions that belong properly to other committees, and which some of us might be willing to vote for. The purpose of this bill is to remonetize silver. I hope, therefore, we will adhere strictly to that sound principle of our policy.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. MILLS.

Mr. HAWK. I ask that that amendment be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out section 3 from the fourth to the fifteenth line, inclusive, and insert:

SEC. 3520. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, without limit, all silver bullion, trade-dollars, and foreign silver coins that may be offered for sale at the market value of silver, and such purchases shall be continued as long as 412½ grains of standard silver can be purchased for one dollar of legal-tender Treasury notes. All such purchases shall be paid for with a new issue of legal-tender Treasury notes. And all holders of any of the silver coins of the United States may present the same in any sum not less than $20 and receive therefor legal-tender Treasury notes at par for the same. That all silver coins of the United States shall be receivable in payment of all Government dues and shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public or private, for any sum whatever. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have the silver bullion, trade-dollars, and foreign silver pieces coined as fast as possible into American silver coins and to apply all silver coins of the United States that may come into the Treasury to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt, before using any of the gold or Treasury notes of the Government, for such purposes.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 60, nays 155, not voting 70; as follows:

Mr. WARNER. If I have no right to object it has no force, but if I have a right to do so I stand on my objection.

Mr. WHITE. I withdraw my motion to adjourn so the gentleman from Illinois may send his amendment up to be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who moved the House do now adjourn withdraws that motion, and the amendment to the third section as moved by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will now be read as next in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for section 3 the following:

SEC. 3. That section 3520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3520. Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint to be formed into bars of fine silver or coined into standard dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, as herein provided, and no deposit of silver, other than as herein provided, shall be received. No deposit shall be of less value than $100, nor of bullion unsuitable for the operations of the mint. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the bullion so deposited to be coined into standard silver dollars, to the capacity of the mints, in connection with other coinage authorized by law. He shall ascertain the market value of all silver bullion at the time it is deposited, and he shall issue therefor certificates, in denominations of not less than $5, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes, each dollar indicated in such certificates to represent 412½ grains of standard silver; and said certificates to the amount of the market value of the bullion so deposited shall be paid to the person depositing the same; and the remaining certificates, representing the difference between the market value of the bullion and the nominal value of the certificates, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States, and shall be deemed a part of the current revenue. The certificates issued in pursuance of this section shall be received at par in payment of all dues to the United States, including duties on imports, and shall be a legal tender in payment of the ordinary and current expenses of the Government, and shall be redeemed by the United States on demand in standard silver dollars to the amount such coin may be in the Treasury, and if such coin be not in the Treasury, in silver bullion, and an amount of such bullion or dollars equal to the outstanding silver certificates herein authorized to be issued shall be retained in the Treasury for such redemption. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint shall make such regulations for carrying this section into effect as will best protect the interests of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] now proposes to modify his amendment in the manner which will be stated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Make a period after the word "deposited" in line 15 of the amendment; after the word "deposited" in line 15 strike out, in lines 15 and 16, the words "and he shall issue therefor" and insert in lieu thereof the words "He is also authorized and required to issue to the full amount of the bullion so deposited;" making it read, as modified, as follows:

He shall ascertain the market value of all silver bullion at the time it is deposited. He is also authorized and required to issue to the full amount of the bullion so deposited certificates in denominations of not less than $5, &c.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GEDDES,] who desires to offer an amendment to the amendment. I will accept it as a modification of my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "denominations," in the sixteenth line, the following words: "at the discretion of the depositor."

The SPEAKER. The amendment had better be read as modified first by the gentleman from Illinois, and then by the gentleman from Ohio; so that if it should go over till morning it may appear in the RECORD exactly as it is proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to have it voted on.

Mr. SPRINGER. The modifications do not change the substance of the original proposition, and are merely verbal, except that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio permits the depositor to indicate the denominations of the certificates.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read as modified in the form in which it will be next voted on.

Mr. WHITE. Will it not appear so in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. Should there be an immediate adjournment, then the Chair is desirous to have the amendment published in the RECORD as modified. If there is no objection the time of reading can be saved, and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD as modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER'S amendment, as modified, is as follows:

Substitute for section 3 the following:

SEC. 3. That section 3520 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3520. Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint to be formed into bars of fine silver or coined into standard dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, as herein provided, and no deposit of silver, other than as herein provided, shall be received. No deposit shall be of less value than $100, nor of bullion unsuitable for the operations of the mint. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the bullion so deposited to be coined into standard silver dollars, to the capacity of the mints, in connection with other coinage authorized by law. He shall ascertain the market value of all silver bullion at the time it is deposited. He is also authorized and required to issue to the full amount of the bullion so deposited certificates, in denominations, at the discretion of the depositor, of not less than $5, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes, each dollar indicated in such certificates to represent 412½ grains of standard silver; and said certificates to the amount of the market value of the bullion so deposited shall be paid to the person depositing the same; and the remaining certificates, representing the difference between the market value of the bullion and the nominal value of the certificates, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States, and shall be deemed a part of the current revenue. The certificates issued in pursuance of this section shall be received at par in payment of all dues to the United States, including duties on imports, and shall be a legal tender in payment of the ordinary and current expenses of the Government, and shall be redeemed by the United States on demand in standard silver dollars to the amount such coin may be in the Treasury, and if such coin be not in the Treasury, in silver bullion, and an amount of such bullion or dollars equal to the outstanding silver certificates herein authorized to be issued shall be retained in the Treasury for such redemption. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint shall make such regulations for carrying this section into effect as will best protect the interests of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois as modified.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "bullion," in the fourth line of Mr. SPRINGER'S amendment, the words "mined and produced from the mines in the United States."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois accept that as a modification of his amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the gentleman from Colorado wants that to be pending in case of the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CONGER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado would have to be acted upon before the question was taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois; otherwise it could not get in.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, as now modified, should be adopted, then the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado could come in as an addition.

Mr. CONGER. The pending amendment is that of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] As it has now been modified, it is desired to amend that by the insertion of the words proposed by the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. BELFORD.] This is an amendment only in the second degree.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, there is another amendment pending.

Mr. CONGER. I understood that was accepted by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Is not the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado the same as was voted down yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not able to answer that question. But if it is the same, the Chair thinks that would not prevent his again offering it at a different stage, if germane to another section.

Mr. WARNER. Is there not already an amendment to the amendment pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ascertained that there is not.

Mr. FORT. I desire, if an amendment is in order, to submit one.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order except by consent.

Mr. WARNER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to receive any amendments that may be offered, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] objects, because there are already two amendments pending which are all that are allowed under the rule.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not wish to add to or to change the amendment I have offered to section 8. I simply wish to change the references to the pages of the bill. The references in my amendment as now printed are to the first copy of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] will be read in the form in which he now desires it to stand.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9 strike out "five" and insert "twenty."

In line 14 strike out "which" and insert the word "and" at the end of the line.

In line 15 strike out "certificates."

In line 16 strike out all after the word "deposited" to "Treasury" in line 18 inclusive.

At the end of the section add: "Provided, That all certificates for gold or silver bullion shall be issued at the market value of such bullion at the city of New York, at the time of the deposit."

Mr. WARNER. I now call for the previous question on the entire bill and pending amendments.

Mr. WHITE. I only withdrew the motion to adjourn for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Illinois to modify his amendment. I now renew it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ROBINSON, till Thursday next; and to Mr. KITCHIN, for twelve days, on account of the illness of his wife.

SILVER COINAGE.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House do now adjourn; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] states that he now asks the previous question on the pending section.

Mr. WARNER. I leave that to stand, pending the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WHITE. I do not agree to any condition of that kind.

The SPEAKER. The understanding was that the bill was open to amendment by sections.

The question was taken on Mr. WHITE'S motion, and it was agreed to.

And accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EATON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 610) regulating the registration of marriages in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 611) authorizing the employment of an inspector of plumbing in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 612) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to extend the area for the taking up and impounding of domestic animals into the county of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask leave to introduce a bill without notice, for the relief of Jacob D. Jones. I introduce it by request, not knowing anything in respect to the merits of the case.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 613) for the relief of Jacob D. Jones; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 31) for the relief of Hugh Worthington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 261) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There seems to be no further morning business. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope not. Let us take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer an amendment to the pending appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The business I propose to lay before the Senate in executive session I am sure will not take over half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. I hope that will not be done. Let us proceed with the pending business of the Senate, the legislative appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I move to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning-hour business the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BURNSIDE. May I be allowed to say, then, that at three o'clock to-day I shall move to go into executive session, unless the amendments to be proposed to the appropriation bill are acted upon before that time? The matter I ask the Senate to go into executive session upon is of a great deal of importance to many people.

Mr. BECK. I will say to the Senator that I will yield for an executive session at four o'clock, whether we get through with the amendments or not, if he will allow us to go on until that time.

Mr. ALLISON. Say five o'clock.

Mr. BURNSIDE. At five o'clock there would be no chance to have an executive session of any length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the pending question is on the amendment reported by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the amendment reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On line 58, page 3, after the word "pensions," it is proposed to insert "clerk to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads;" so as to make the clause read:

> For clerk to the Committee on Finance, clerk to the Committee on Claims, clerk to the Committee on Commerce, clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, clerk to the Committee on Private Land Claims, clerk to the Committee on Pensions, clerk to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, at $2,220 each.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the amendment from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to be proposed as an amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, and that the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations has not been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was agreed to, and the question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the clause of the bill as amended.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, but it has not been concurred in in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no necessity for calling the yeas and nays in Committee of the Whole, as the question will come up again in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia] is necessarily absent this morning and is paired. If he were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Anthony,	Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Bailey,	Coke,	Jonas,	Rollins,
Bell,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Teller,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. Some days ago, by the instruction of the Joint Committee on the Library, I submitted an amendment on page 16, at the close of line 365, to insert the following:

> To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase works of art, $5,000.

This amendment was unanimously agreed to by the Committee on the Library, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to call it up and take a vote upon it at this time. I presume there will no objection to it.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that in making examinations of the appropriations heretofore made for this purpose, we find that there was $15,000 appropriated to the Joint Committee on the Library to buy works of art for the current year, and $3,000 for a special purpose, making $18,000 for the current year. No provision is made for purchasing works of art for the next year, and this is the only application for that purpose, and we do not feel disposed to oppose this amendment, as there is no other appropriation made for this purpose for the coming year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COKE in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. On page 20, line 477, in the appropriations for the Treasury Department, I move to strike out the word "eight" and insert "nine," so as to read "nine assistant chiefs of division, at $2,000 each."

The purpose of the amendment is to add another assistant chief of division to the force in the Treasury Department. I understand that there is a clerk there who has been doing the service of an assistant chief of division for the past twelve months, without compensation, in addition to his other duties. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended to the committee the addition of this assistant chief of division, and I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that there was some error in its not having been reported by the committee at an earlier day. I believe that it will not meet with the opposition of the committee. At all events it is strongly recommended by the Secretary, who deems the additional assistant chief of division to be necessary.

Mr. BECK. I desire only to call attention to the condition of things in the Secretary's office. There are a number of divisions: the appointment division, with a chief and an assistant chief; the division of warrants, estimates, and appropriations, with a chief and an assistant chief; of public moneys, with a chief and an assistant chief; of customs, with a chief and an assistant; of revenue marine, with a chief and an assistant; of stationery, with a chief and an assistant; of internal revenue and navigation, a chief and no assistant; of records, and files, and mails, a chief and no assistant; of loans and currency, which is now consolidated in the Secretary's office, one chief and two assistants, making nine chiefs and eight assistant chiefs. As the Secretary had failed to estimate for this increase now asked, and as he has written a letter since that time asking to have it done, we did not feel at liberty to change the estimates or to increase the force, seeing that he had so many chiefs and so many assistant chiefs, although he writes a letter making out a pretty strong case for it. Has the letter been read?

Mr. CALL. No, sir.

Mr. BECK. I should like the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to be read. The committee thought there ought to be no increase there; but the Senate can do as they please about it. We thought there were chiefs and assistants enough. Is the Secretary's letter at the desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter has not been sent up with the amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. The committee then do not recommend this increase?

Mr. BECK. The committee make a recommendation not to make it, because it is not estimated for in the Book of Estimates, and we think that there are chiefs and assistant chiefs enough.

Mr. CALL. There is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury which I submitted to the Committee on Appropriations. I had it here, but I cannot find it at this moment. It is well known, however, to the Senator in charge of the bill that the additional chief of division was strongly recommended by the Secretary.

Mr. BECK. I said that it was.

Mr. CALL. As I understand, this matter has come very recently to the notice of the committee, and if it received any examination at the hands of the committee I suppose it must have been a very hasty one. The fact I understand to be that there is a clerk in the Department who for the past twelve months has been performing, in addition to his ordinary duties, the duties of an assistant chief of division. I understand that he is a meritorious clerk, that he has rendered faithful and efficient service to the Government not only in his capacity as a clerk, but that he rendered meritorious military service during the war. However that may be, it is unquestionably true that the Senate have the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, and there is no denial of the fact that this officer has been performing this service, and has performed it for a long time without compensation, and that he will be compelled to do so for the next twelve months unless this action is taken.

I apprehend that there is no purpose on the part of the committee, and no purpose on the part of the Senate, and no just purpose with anybody to require services to be performed without an adequate compensation, and this compensation is what would be required to be paid to a clerk doing the same duty. I do not know why, the facts having been submitted to the Senator in charge of the bill, the amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the amendment be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Florida has the letter now.

Mr. CALL. I send two letters to the desk and ask that they be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letters will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the appropriations made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill as passed by the House of Representatives for the service of the Treasury Department for the next fiscal year.

When I assumed control of this Department the salaries and the number of employés had been materially reduced by a Congress composed of two Houses representing both political parties. I felt it my duty to accept the reduction in good faith and to reorganize the Department to carry out the intention of the appropriation act. No office was filled unless the service required it, and in all those branches of the service in which I had discretionary authority the number anp salaries of the employés were largely reduced, as instance the reorganization of the customs service and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The appropriation act fixing the number and salaries of the employés for the present fiscal year was taken as the basis of the next year's estimates.

It is proposed by this bill to further reduce the number and salaries and to change the classification of the clerical force of the Department. This policy of annual changes and adjustments is not in the interest of the service, and the very small savings become questionable economy in the light of efficient and effective discharge of public duties.

Since the first general reduction of August 15, 1876, there has been no reason for further reductions in either the salaries or clerical service of this Department by reason of decrease of duties to be performed. In some of the branches of the Department gradual increase may be expected, as the tendency of legislation is to place more details upon the accounting officers.

Unless the policy of the Government is greatly changed in the present manner of collecting and disbursing the revenue, no reduction in the clerical force of the accounting offices can be anticipated. When the clerical force of a department is insufficient to meet the demands upon it the work will not be done well if done at all. Officers who collect and disburse public moneys should know that their accounts will be promptly examined and every expenditure scrutinized by competent and faithful clerks. Any legislation tending to delay the settlement of fiscal accounts is unwise. Perhaps no one thing has induced me to address your committee at this time on this subject so much as the information which has reached me that many accounts of disbursing officers have been in the Department for six months without having been opened, owing to the gradual clerical reductions of the past few years. It would be much better policy to cut off certain branches of the public service than to cripple the functions of the Treasury Department in its duties of receiving and accounting for the revenues.

The funding operations are just now not only increasing that branch of the service, but increasing the duties incidentally in the other branches of the Department.

As to the salaries of employés, I think the amounts fixed in the appropriation act of 1877, in the light of salaries created by Congress since that time, under rather than above proper compensation. I have not so much to urge, however, against the reduction of salaries as against the policy of uncertainty adopted in the appropriation bills, though to continue the policy year after year of reducing the number of higher grade clerks and supplying their places with lower grade will in the end demoralize the service and dishearten faithful public servants.

In the reduction of three fourth and three third class clerks in this office, as proposed in the present bill, three fourth-class clerks must be reduced to third, six third to second, six second to first, and six first to $1,000, or dropped. In all twenty-one persons in the Secretary's office alone suffer a reduction of salary, and substantially the same rate pertains to every other office of the Department.

Heretofore a large sum has been given for temporary clerks of the Department. For this purpose there were appropriated last year $64,500, and for this year $25,000.

I have not estimated for any temporary clerks for the next year, and it is thought none will be required if Congress will preserve the present organization.

I inclose a copy of the bill as passed by the House of Representatives, with my amendments to conform to the suggestions herein made. I have added one to the number of assistant chiefs allowed for the Secretary's office, making one less than the number originally allowed by the act of March 3, 1875, and have increased the pay of the captain of the watch and his two lieutenants to what I consider no more than fair remuneration for their services.

The Second Comptroller urgently requests that additional amendments be made so as to allow for his office in place of three of the nine-hundred-dollar class, one clerk of the second class, one clerk of the third class, and one clerk of the fourth class.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to an item in the estimates submitted for the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. When the office was reorganized under the act of March 3, 1875, (United States Statutes, volume 18, part 3, page 349,) provision was made for eight assistant chiefs of division at $2,400 each. This number was fixed upon after a careful examination of the needs of the office at that time. Notwithstanding the increase of its business, estimates were submitted to the last Congress for but six assistant chiefs of division at $2,000 each, and one assistant chief of division at $2,400, which estimates have also been submitted to the present Congress.

I beg leave to request that this number of assistant chiefs of divisions at $2,000 be increased by one, which will but put the force of assistant chiefs at that number which was considered necessary when the office was reorganized on what was expected to be a permanent basis in 1875, (and which number is still necessary to complete the present organization,) while the total reduction in salary from the sums estimated for in the reorganization at that time will be $2,800.

The item desired to be amended in estimates for the Treasury Department, office of the Secretary, now stands: six assistant chiefs of division at $2,000, $12,000; as amended it would read: seven assistant chiefs of division at $2,000, $14,000.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BECK. I have only to say that in estimating for the force necessary for the Treasury Department there is no estimate for this office. The Secretary of the Treasury has by this bill all the force that is allowed him by the existing law, as we understand it, nine chiefs and eight assistant chiefs. The Secretary complains very much of not having enough force, but I should like to read a letter from one officer of that Department at least who has not only told us that it could be done but has shown us how he could reduce the force in his office twenty-seven, fifteen in the division of national currency, and twelve in the division of loans, in the Treasurer's office proper. I have a letter from the Treasurer in which he shows there has been more force allowed than he wants, and with his consent we have reduced the force twenty-seven. While it does not exactly apply to this particular case, I should like to make this letter part of the RECORD.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. To be printed without having it read?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Kentucky has stated the substance of it.

Mr. BECK. I have stated the substance of the Treasurer's letter, and I will send it to the Reporter. The Senate can vote upon this amendment so far as I am concerned.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 22, 1879.

SIR: Referring to the legislative appropriation bill now pending before Congress, and especially to the appropriations made for the force employed in redeeming national currency in this office and in that of the Comptroller of the Currency, I desire to represent that there will probably be such a decrease in the receipts of national-bank notes for redemption as to warrant a reduction of the above force by reason of the effect of the following order issued by this office under date of September 24, 1878:

"On and after October 1, 1878, the charges for the transportation of national-bank notes to the Treasurer of the United States for redemption under the act approved June 20, 1874, (18 Statutes, 123,) must be paid by the party making the remittance."

After careful consideration, I think that in the office of the Treasurer of the United States the present state of the business will permit of a reduction of not more than seven clerks of class 1, and eight clerks of the $900 class, in all fifteen, which will be a total annual saving of $15,600 so far as this office is concerned.

The duty of this office, under the act of June 20, 1874, is to receive the national currency sent for redemption, to assort out the notes of each national bank into fit and unfit, to send the unfit, assorted by banks, to the Comptroller of the Currency, and the fit to the bank of issue; and at the end of the year to reimburse the United States from the 5 per cent. fund of the banks, which stands to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States for the charges of transportation and the cost of assorting such notes in both offices, and it is only on that account that I take the liberty of calling attention to certain facts in regard to the force required in the office of the Comptroller in handling the unfit notes sent to him.

The following table shows the amount of notes sent by this office under the present redemption system to the Comptroller from 1874 to 1878, together with the salaries paid and the cost of handling each $1,000 in such notes in that office:

Fiscal year.	Amount of unfit notes received from Treasurer.	Paid for salaries.	Cost per $1,000.
1874–'75	$115,109,445	$21,268 84	$0 18
1875–'76	78,643,155	33,601 56	43
1876–'77	62,518,600	25,457 22	41
1877–'78	51,585,400	22,297 88	43

By which it appears that while the amount of notes handled has decreased, the expenses of the redemption system in that office have increased from eighteen cents per $1,000 in 1874–'75, to forty-three cents in 1877–'78, arising from the fact that the decrease of unfit notes has been more rapid than the decrease of force employed thereon, and the present year will show a much larger decrease in the amount of notes.

The following table giving similar items for this office for the same period is also submitted:

Fiscal year.	Amount assorted.	Paid for salaries.	Cost per $1.000.
1874–'75	$130,322,945	$136,958 55	$1 05
1875–'76	176,121,855	154,417 38	88
1876–'77	213,588,900	125,238 46	59
1877–'78	204,022,700	114,282 75	56

From the above table it will appear that so far as the Treasurer's office is concerned while the receipts of national-bank notes for redemption have increased the expenses of handling them has diminished from $1.05 per $1,000 in notes in 1874–'75 to fifty-six cents in the last fiscal year.

I cannot, of course, make any recommendation for the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, but call the attention of your committee to the facts in the hope that such force may be authorized as shall not be in excess of that required for performing the duty devolved upon it under the present redemption system, and that the banks may not be subjected to the expense of paying any larger force than is required in the redemption of their notes under the above-mentioned act.

In fixing the reduction for this office I have acted with great care, and am firmly of the opinion that the business will not stand a greater reduction than I have recommended above.

Very respectfully,

JAS. GILFILLAN,
Treasurer of the United States.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KERNAN. The Chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] was called away unexpectedly yesterday and requested me to present an amendment to the bill, which is recommended, I believe unanimously, by the Committee on Finance. It was printed and sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and I now offer it to come in on page 20, after line 464:

For diplomatic and consular service, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

There is nothing appropriated for contingent expenses for the Department of State. This is not asked except in case a contingency should arise, which it is thought may arise owing to what we see is going on in Europe, and there shall be a movement by certain governments there, they being the moving parties, with a view of trying to arrange for the coinage of silver at some uniform rate to be adhered to by all. The Finance Committee recommend this appropriation that it may be used to send a representative of this country to any such conference if one shall be called, there to represent the interests and views of the people of the United States.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senate that when this amendment came to it by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Finance, the Committee on Appropriations determined not to make any recommendation one way or the other about it, but to leave it to the Senate on such statements as the Committee on Finance might see fit to make.

Some members of the Committee on Appropriations were individually in favor of it and some perhaps not; but I am authorized to say that the action of the Senate upon this amendment must be taken independent of any recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations; and this is the reason that we were embarrassed about it. In the last consular and diplomatic bill passed during the current fiscal year the House of Representatives agreed, as the very last clause of the bill, to this provision:

For diplomatic and consular service, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

The precise provision now proposed. The Senate also agreed to that; but after both Houses had agreed to it—I have the bill in my hand as it passed—it dropped out of the law.

Mr. ALLISON. How?

Mr. BECK. How, I do not know. I have the law, and I have the bill as it passed the committee of conference. It is marked "out" as if by the committee of conference. How and upon what terms the committee of conference struck it out, I am not prepared to say. I do not see by what authority they could strike it out because it had passed both Houses; but in the law as it passed, as Senators will see by examining it, the provision is omitted. Finding the case to be in this form, we determined to submit the facts to the Senate. I thought myself that it was an appropriation, under all the information laid before the Committee on Finance, very proper to be made, and I voted for it in the Committee on Finance before it went to the Committee on Appropriations. Finding this condition of things in the last bill, it occurred to me that there was some mistake about the matter or this would be the law now.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be agreed to without opposition.

Mr. GARLAND. I desire to ask the Senator from New York a question. Does he move this amendment by direction of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. KERNAN. I stated that the Committee on Finance unanimously requested our chairman to propose it. He offered it and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations. He was called away and asked me to present it.

Mr. GARLAND. And the Committee on Appropriations make no recommendation about it.

Mr. KERNAN. That is true; but they state the fact that both Houses did agree to the same thing at the last session, and they leave it to the Senate. I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand from the Senator from New York that this $20,000 is to enable the State Department to appoint a representative to a conference to consider the value of silver coin.

Mr. KERNAN. It does not say so in form; but the Committee on Finance recommend that the money be appropriated to be used for the purpose, preferring not to put in the law the specific use, inasmuch as it is understood other governments will move; and it is to show that we are ready to meet them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no objection to the object or to any other object the State Department may desire to accomplish; but I am opposed to this general grant of contingent expenses to different Departments of the Government because I fear that, unless they are limited and fixed, these contingent funds will be used for other and sometimes illegitimate purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Delaware that no part of this fund can be used for what are ordinarily called contingent expenses. In other words, no part of it can be used to add to any expenses now authorized by law. It can only be used for some new and distinct purpose, and I think the Senator from New York has very clearly stated the object for which it is proposed. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. BECK. I should like to add a line to it. If the Senator from New York would accept this modification, it would make the amendment more satisfactory to some Senators:

And an account of the expenditure thereof shall be submitted to Congress in December, 1880.

Mr. KERNAN. That is very satisfactory and proper. Say "any expenditure." I think all the members of the committee will agree that it is proper to say that and it meets my approbation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding:

And an account of any expenditure thereof shall be submitted to the Congress that meets in December, 1880.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope that will be added.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer an amendment. On pages 76 and 77, in line 1869, strike out "7" and insert "8;" in line 1871 to strike out "27" and insert "28," and in line 1872 to strike out "13" and insert "14."

In support of the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter from the Postmaster-General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1879.

Hon. S. B. MAXEY,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

I have the honor to recommend that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be amended so as to allow to the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General eight clerks of class 4, twenty-eight clerks of class 3, and fourteen of class 2, instead of the numbers now provided for. This increase is very much needed, in consequence of the large increase of new mail-routes, largely increasing the work of that office.

Very respectfully,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. MAXEY. The number of clerks of class 4 in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is seven, which we propose to make 8; of class 3, twenty-seven, which we propose to change to twenty-eight; of class 2, thirteen, which we propose to change to fourteen.

This communication from the Postmaster-General says that this increase is very much needed in consequence of the large increase of new mail routes, largely increasing the work of that office. I assume that if it be true, as stated in this letter, that this increase is very much needed, it was the duty of the Postmaster-General to report that fact to Congress. I also assume as a proposition of law that an act or communication made by an officer within the purview of his duty and within the line of his duty is to be presumed to be correct until the contrary is shown. The Postmaster-General, who is intrusted by law with this duty, makes the statement that these three additional clerks are very much needed; the presumption of law is that that statement is true, and he who seeks to set it aside must do so by proof.

Now, I hold that if the Government of the United States is to be conducted faithfully, honorably, and efficiently, we must furnish the officers who are to conduct the Government with the means of accomplishing their duties; and when a solemn statement is made officially by an officer under his official oath and sanction that a thing is necessary to be done, we must assume that that is true unless the contrary is shown; and a mere conjecture is not evidence before anybody. Therefore I say that just as much as it was the duty of the Postmaster-General to make these reports, if the facts stated by him are true, (and they are presumed in law to be true,) it is just as much the duty of Congress to comply with his request as it was his duty to make the request. As we are responsible for the proper conduct and management of the Post-Office Department, and we therefore should furnish him with the means necessary to accomplish his duty, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BECK. This is another opportunity for the Senate to show its liberality, as I presume it will, but I call for the yeas and nays on this also. We have added to the Post-Office Department, on an urgent letter of the Postmaster-General and the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, on careful examination by both committees, ten clerks for that branch; we have added one to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's force; making an addition of eleven in the Post-Office Department. The bill came from the House almost three weeks ago, and was submitted to the Senate Committee on Appropriations. The Postmaster-General never appeared before that committee, nor has he sent any communications to the Appropriation Committee of either House asking for this additional increase.

He sees fit to keep away from the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate, and he writes a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads without coming before either of those committees who are charged with these appropriations and showing us why he ought to have the additional force, for what he needs them, what particular service he is going to employ them in, and the Senator from Texas is going very far when he says that this body ought, because an officer of the Government comes and asks for a particular number of clerks, to give them to him merely because on his responsibility he says he should like to have them. If that is the case, then no appropriation bill of this character can ever properly be brought below the estimates of the Departments. There has not been a bill for five years, in my judgment, that has come up to the estimates of the Departments of what they would like to have. All scrutiny, all examination into their wants must be taken away from us if we are to accept and to submit to what they ask. I repeat if we are to accept as absolutely true the statement of each head of a Department of what he wants or would like to have, we must abandon our control.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I ask him if it is not true as a maxim of the law that all official acts solemnly done in the line of duty of an officer are presumed to be true until the contrary is shown?

Mr. BECK. Oh, but this is not an official act.

Mr. MAXEY. I think it is.

Mr. BECK. It is a recommendation to the Senate and House of Representatives who are the judges of what is necessary for the good of the service.

Mr. MAXEY. I make the point that it is an official act, for it is incumbent by law on him to discharge the duties of that Department, and if in the discharge of those duties it becomes apparent to him that additional force is necessary, it is his duty to make application to Congress, and that is presumed to be a correct application unless the contrary is shown.

Mr. BECK. He has made no application to either of the committees charged with the duty of determining the number of employés that ought to be in that Department, and he has carefully abstained from appearing before the Senate or House committee, so far as I know, either verbally or in writing, to say that these additional clerks are necessary.

Why was that? It was part of his official duty, if he desired any increase of clerks or to make any complaint that the committees of the House and Senate had not dealt fairly by him, either to send them an official communication or to come himself and see them. He has done neither. He having failed to do either and having been liberally treated as I think, by an addition of eleven clerks upon recommendations made to the different committees and carefully examined, especially by the House and again by the Senate committee, I say it is treating the regular committees of the two Houses badly for the Postmaster-General to write to the chairman of a committee not charged with this business instead of coming before the Committee on Appropriations that has charge of these things and trying to show them wherein the good of the service required an addition, wherein they had been wrong. For one I shall vote against it, and shall call for the yeas and nays upon this increase.

If the democratic party are going to start in this way and we are to take all the estimates of the heads of Departments as right because they are official and we are called on to disprove their correctness, when they even address them to committees not charged with the bills, and do not even appear before us to tell what they want, then we are at sea and we are at the mercy of the head of any Department who may want anything, without any means of knowing whether it is correct or not.

Mr. MCDONALD. I do not know, of course, what action the Postmaster-General has taken in regard to this matter; but this proposed increase is in the bureau of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and on the 30th of April, at the request of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, I submitted to the Senate and had referred to the Committee on Appropriations these same amendments. I have here the original suggestion of amendments, the indorsements on it showing that it went to the committee April 30, 1879. The committee reported the bill back without taking any notice of these amendments, and I suppose they found themselves too much engaged to even advise me that they were considering them. They were acted upon in the committee, if acted on at all, without any information so far as I was concerned than the mere offering of the amendments. But the suggestion was not my own, as a matter of course. The suggestion was made because of the information which General Brady, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, had communicated to me. As he is a citizen of my State I suppose he thought, not being himself the Postmaster-General, being a subordinate in that Department, that it would be as well for him to communicate with one of the representatives on this floor from his State.

In support of the amendment I send to the Secretary's desk a note which I have recently received from him since the report has been made by the committee, in which no notice was taken of these proposed amendments, setting forth the reasons why this is necessary. I think the reading of that letter will show very clearly that whatever may be the facts in regard to the force in other Departments, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is not asking for any great increase in force, and certainly not commensurate with the increase of service that is thrown on that division of the Post-Office Department by the increases which have taken place recently under the action of Congress and that are constantly taking place under the general law. I ask that the letter be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1879.

DEAR SIR: In response to your personal request, I have the honor to state that my request that the legislative, executive, and judicial bill now pending in the Senate be amended so as to allow this office eight clerks of class 4, twenty-eight clerks of class 3, and fourteen clerks of class 2, instead of the numbers now provided for, was made in consequence of recent legislation relative to subletting mail contracts, together with the great increase in the number of post-roads, (over nineteen hundred routes having been established under date of March 3, 1879,) rendering an increase in the clerical force of this office absolutely necessary.

Very respectfully,

THOS. J. BRADY.

Hon. JOSEPH E. MCDONALD,
United States Senate.

Mr. McDONALD. I will state that this is but an increase of three clerks in this division over what has been reported in the bill, an additional clerk in each one of the three classes there named.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to add to what has been stated by the Senator from Indiana, that this is confined to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's division, confined to the mail service which is increasing all the time. I think the Senator has stated that. I desire in this connection to answer as far as I can what has been stated by the Senator from Kentucky, who has charge of the bill; there has been no intention here to pay any disrespect to the Committee on Appropriations. The Postmaster-General has adopted the usual method. There has been no irregularity whatever. This matter has been before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, considered carefully by it; the chairman of that committee was directed to report it to the Senate and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. On the 14th of this month the chairman, in obedience to the direction of the committee, reported it to the Senate, asked that the letter of the Postmaster-General be read, and I find it here in the RECORD; it was read; and the amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations; and that committee saw fit to dissent from the recommendation of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It was printed and laid upon the tables of Senators.

Now, I say that the most perfect regularity has been observed. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is the organ through which the Postmaster-General usually communicates to the Senate, and that has been the usual practice. He has adopted that in this instance. His request followed the regular channels, and finally lodged in the Committee on Appropriations. That committee, as I have said, have seen fit to report adversely, and the only resort is to the Senate; and the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has again followed out the direction of that committee, and now presses it upon the attention of the Senate.

What is it that is asked? An increase of three clerks in the mail service under the Second-Assistant Postmaster-General. We all know how that service is increasing, how the West is spreading out, what an increase of mail-routes is constantly taking place. The last post-route bill that we had was the largest that was passed by Congress, I think one hundred and seventeen pages of mere mail-routes, in addition to those already in existence, giving us the knowledge of the fact that the mail service is constantly increasing at the West and the South. Now, in order to provide for this service, in order that the clerical force may be adequate to discharge fully this duty, the Postmaster-General has asked three more clerks for this branch of his Department. I think the request is moderate, and I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not press his objection to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I desire first to say a word in reply to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD.] He seems to think that because he had referred an amendment to us, which we did not agree to, therefore we had not had either time or inclination to consider it; and because, furthermore, he had a private letter in his pocket, which he now reads for the first time, but which he failed to send to us, it was our business to hunt him up and tell him that we were going to consider it.

Mr. McDONALD. No, Mr. President, I wish to correct my friend. I did not have that letter at that time; but if the committee had notified me they were considering this subject and asked me for the reasons why I desired to have these amendments made, I should certainly have told them all that I then knew, which was the substance of what is now contained in that letter; that had been communicated to me before that by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and upon which information I offered the amendments. The only trouble was that they did not have time to send for me and did not do it; and I made no communication to them further than to send the amendments, and they lost the information that I had in my possession, and I have communicated it to the Senate now.

Mr. BECK. When a Senator sends an amendment to the Committee on Appropriations bearing upon public affairs, the presumption is that the officer who asks him to move it is going to communicate to that committee the facts upon which he desires the amendment to be made, or that the Senator who offers the amendment will furnish to the committee some information upon that subject. Neither the Second Assistant Postmaster-General nor the Senator from Indiana ever furnished the committee any information upon this subject; and I desire to say to him now and to all other Senators that it has not been the habit, nor is it possible, during the sittings of the Committee on Appropriations for them to go to the various committee rooms and hunt up members and ask them to come and give us such information as they may privately have. The practice has been, and it is the only proper practice, for Senators who have amendments, to lay the information before the committee on which they expect the committee to act, and not for the committee to go and hunt them up individually to ask them upon what authority or upon what evidence they are doing it.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Senator if this information is not now submitted to the Senate? They know exactly the information in the possession of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and the information which I as a Senator had in regard to the matter. And I wish to ask him now if that would have been sufficient, if it had been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, to have induced the committee to report in favor of these amendments?

Mr. BECK. I say this: if we had by thorough examination of the Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General ascertained what the clerks they now have are doing, what labor they are performing, and the necessity there is for this increase, then, perhaps, we should have reported favorably; but their say-so alone is not necessarily conclusive upon us, especially when for the last fiscal year we gave the Second Assistant Postmaster-General sixty-seven clerks, and he and his chief, when making out an estimate for the service for the year 1880, the year for which we are now providing, estimated for sixty-seven and we gave them sixty-eight clerks, because they went before the House committee and showed that they wanted one more.

Now, when we have exceeded their own estimate of their own wants—for they only estimated sixty-seven for the current year for the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's office and we have allowed sixty-eight—and when they go to the House committee to ask for an addition of one and obtain that addition of one because of the wants of the service, then I say it is bad faith in the Postmaster-General and his assistant to go to any private Senator, withholding information from the proper committee and refusing to go before that committee and failing to lay any information before it, and then ask us to agree to amendments that either other committees or other members propose in excess of the estimates that they themselves sent to us as to their wants.

If the Postmaster-General or his assistant had come before me I would have taken the Book of Estimates and shown it to him and said, "Sir, you estimated for sixty-seven clerks; we have given you sixty-eight; why did you not estimate for what you needed?" And when he came to explain the facts, perhaps his explanation would have been such that he could have maintained himself before the Senate, or perhaps not. But if, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] says, we are to take whatever the heads of Departments say, I refer to the estimates in this case. Sixty-seven is the number of clerks the Post-Office Department asked for this office. We have in the bill given one more than they asked for. If they have changed their minds since then, it was their duty to send in additional estimates, but since this Congress met they have sent no estimates asking for additional clerks or showing any increase of service that was not fully known to them when these estimates were sent in.

Mr. McDONALD. I cannot admit that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has been acting in bad faith in this matter. It does not seem to me very strange that he should go to a Senator from his own State to suggest, without going before the committee, what he wanted. When the amendment was placed in my charge, I said to him that upon the question being reached in the committee I apprehended I would have some information about it and then he could go with me before the committee and I would go with him; but as I never heard anything further from the amendments until the bill was reported back here, I did not know but that they had been acted on favorably.

Mr. WALLACE. It seems to me that we must have some control of this subject of the expenditure of the public money somewhere, and the question here is whether it is to be in the heads of the Departments or in the Appropriations Committees of the two bodies.

Mr. McDONALD. Or in the Senate.

Mr. WALLACE. In the Appropriations Committee originally and then in their report to the Senate, undoubtedly. I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana; but primarily the subject of criticising the estimates submitted by the heads of Departments is in the Appropriations Committees of the two bodies and they report their views to the respective Houses. Now, we have taken these estimates; we have reported in this bill what we conceive to be the proper amount of appropriation for clerks in the Post-Office Department. Without calling upon us specially in reference to this subject, a demand is made for an additional supply of money for clerks in that Department. It is the most natural thing in the world for the head of a Department to be pressing for more money for his Department, or more supplies and more clerks. In spite of themselves they are pressed forward. Party demands, the demands of the service as they see it—all of these press them forward. But the question of the amount of money that ought to be appropriated for that service is ultimately in the Senate and its organized committees, and here is the place at which we are to apply the knife, if any is to be applied.

The Appropriations Committee acting in this view, and not constrained and held as the Senator from Texas would have us believe by the mere statement of the head of a Department, has undertaken to say that certain appropriations should be made. If the Senate and the House see fit to overrule us of the committee in those recommendations, as a matter of course we must submit; but we shall never bring the appropriations of the Government within the legitimate revenues of the Government if we take the estimates of the heads of Departments as our basis; and yet that is the doctrine of the Senator from Texas. We should not have reduced the expenditures of the Government as they have been reduced within the last four years, if we had taken the estimates of the heads of Departments. Compare the laws of the last four years with the estimates of the heads of the Departments, all of them, and see to what extent they have been cut by the action of the Senate and House under the recommendations of the Appropriations Committees; and it is the only rule. We cannot trust the heads of the Departments to make estimates that are to control and govern us exclusively.

I rose to say this simply because I thought it was due the Appropriations Committee and their action in regard to this subject.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is, as I understand it, whether some three or four additional clerks shall be allowed in one of the divisions of the Post-Office Department. If they are needed they ought to be there; if they are not needed there, of course they should not be provided and paid for. Perhaps the Committee on Appropriations knows better than the Post-Office Department and the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads whether they are needed or not. According to the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, it ought to know better than both the Postmaster-General and the Post-Office Committee.

As a general thing all of us, whether belonging to the Post-Office Committee or the Appropriations Committee, know this, that the business of this division of the Post-Office Department is increasing steadily and rapidly. If I am not misinformed, during the last year there have been two hundred new post-offices established in the State of Nebraska; in the State of Texas I do not know how many, but a very large number are being established; and so throughout all our western Territories. The establishment of new post-offices and new post-routes throws additional labor upon this division of the Post-Office Department. The chief of the division and the Postmaster-General and the Post-Office Committee say that this additional labor thrown upon this division requires additional clerical force there. The Appropriations Committee say either that this additional clerical force is not needed or that they do not know whether it is needed or not, I do not know which they say——

Mr. WITHERS. They have no evidence from the Department that it is needed.

Mr. BECK. And no request.

Mr. WITHERS. And no request that it is needed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then, in this conflict of authority, and looking to these sources of information, the Senate must say as best it can say whether these three or four additional clerks be needed or not. The Post-Office Department is a Department that is continually growing, continually increasing, and must for many years to come; and Senators from the older States that are fully settled do not know and do not appreciate the growth and the wants of the newer communities. I think the interests of this nation are not jeopardized when, in regard to the question of appointing three or four more additional clerks in the Post-Office Department, the Senate relies with confidence upon the information derived from the head of that Department and from the committee especially charged with the interests of that Department.

For myself, without feeling that I run any risk of doing any injury to our Treasury, I am perfectly sure that I am but doing that which the growth of the labors and work of this Department in the west require when I vote for the amendment recommended by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to say a word on the question. I appreciate very fully the force of the arguments which have been addressed to us, especially from the Senator from Iowa, who was last up. But the continuous growth of the postal service is no new thing. It has marked the progress of the country for years. I have no doubt that that growth was estimated for by the head of the Department when he sent in his estimate for the next fiscal year. Therefore the whole point made by the Senator from Iowa I conceive has been made in that particular by the official estimates of the Department, based upon the prospective increase.

Now, I am one of those Senators from an old State that my friend thinks do not take proper cognizance of the wants of the great West in this growing service; yet, sir, I can appeal to my record here to show that I have been one of the most liberal in my votes of money for the extension of the postal service. I know it requires increase constantly, but I dissent entirely from the doctrine laid down here to-day, that when we give the postal service all their estimates require, when we give them all the clerical service they ask and actually give them more than their estimates demand, we should be called upon to add additional force simply upon the statement of one of the subordinates of the Department in a letter addressed to an individual Senator, when neither the subordinate nor his principal has ever appeared before the Appropriations Committee for the purpose of vindicating the necessity of this increased force.

The position taken by my friend from Texas would simply amount to this, that the Congress of the United States is bound to vote every dollar asked for by the head of any Department when he makes his estimates. Being officers of the Government it is the official duty of the heads of Departments to make the wants of the service known, and it is our duty to give them all they ask for, says the Senator from Texas. If that be the proper construction of the law we might as well disband the Appropriations Committee entirely. What discretion is left to them? Are they not required to examine into the character of the estimates submitted to them and to decide from the best lights before them whether those estimates are required by the service of the particular Department or not? If they are not to be intrusted with this discretion they had just as well be abolished and let every question come up and be decided on the estimates submitted by the heads of the Departments, directly by the Senate or by the House of Representatives, as the case may be.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Virginia states that this amendment is pressed, as I understood him, upon the ground that a letter had been addressed by a subordinate of the Post-Office Department to a Senator in his private capacity, and not to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WITHERS. I referred to the letter read by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MAXEY. I have already read or caused to be read that the Postmaster-General himself, in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads under date of May 14, said:

> This increase is very much needed in consequence of the large increase of new mail-routes largely increasing the work of that office.

And the RECORD shows that the amendment was submitted by myself. It is stated that I submitted one—

> Intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Now, upon the question of estimates, if there is anything wanting in etiquette I must confess, though I do not profess to be a judge of such matters, that I am not able to see it. The letter was addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which does deal directly with the Post-Office Department. It was laid before the Senate by the chairman of that committee. The chairman of that committee took the precaution to have that letter spread upon the record as the basis and foundation upon which he rested the amendment now before the Senate, and that was upon his motion printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That was three or four days ago; so that the Committee on Appropriations, if they were not satisfied that the Postmaster-General was stating truly what he stated in that letter, have had the means of disproving it. After all it returns to this: Shall a great want presented to the Senate of the United States by the head of a Department in respect to his Department stand aside and go for naught on a mere question of etiquette? Many long years ago one gentleman would tender to his adversary the privilege of firing the first shot. That may have been very good French etiquette, but I do not think that in this practical common-sense age of ours there is any need for such etiquette as that.

The question is a question of practical fact: does the Department need this additional force? The Postmaster-General says yes, and he not only says yes, but he gives the reason for it, and that reason, although in a very few words, is conclusive to my mind that it is in consequence of the large increase of new mail-routes, largely increasing the work of that office. Now, the Senators from Kansas know perfectly well that in that State in the last six or eight months the immigration has been enormous. New post-routes and new post-offices of necessity have been established in that State. Out at Leadville, in Colorado, within a few months past a little office that paid only $12 a year when established has sprung up to be a post-office of a city of over twelve thousand inhabitants. The same was true of Deadwood some time ago. And in my State, as my colleague who now occupies the chair is aware, the frontier line has been moved out within the last year or two one hundred and twenty miles, and as it has moved out he and I have many applications to have additional post-routes and additional post-offices established.

It is a duty we owe our people to do it; and what is true of us is true of other gentlemen living in the West and in the Southwest and in the country between the Sierra and the Rocky Mountains. Gentlemen who live in the old States, where they have not had an additional post-office established for five or six years, cannot appreciate, as men who live in the Southwest and West and away out between the mountains, the enormous increase of population constantly going on which necessitates an increase of the work of these officers. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General is the one intrusted with the establishment of the additional post-routes and additional post-offices. Has the Appropriations Committee disproved or even cast a suspicion on the testimony—I call it testimony because the law does—of the Postmaster-General in respect to the needs of his office? If not, the Senate is bound to consider it and act upon it.

Mr. BECK. One word only. The Postmaster-General made all the estimates for his needs when he sent in his regular estimates for the next fiscal year, and we have given all that he said he needed, and he knew as well the increase of business going on then as he does now.

Mr. TELLER. When did he make those estimates?

Mr. BECK. The 1st day of December; and if he had any additional estimates his business was to send them to the extra session when called. He has made none. This bill was referred to the Senate committee on the 28th of April. It was reported back by the Committee on Appropriations to the Senate on the 6th of May. Neither the Postmaster-General nor the Second Assistant Postmaster-General came before the committee from the 28th of April to the 6th of May to make one word of complaint, nor did either send any communication; but on the 14th day of May, the day before yesterday, when the bill would ordinarily have been passed but for some political complications, a letter was written giving no information except that he wanted this additional force to meet the needs of the service. We have given him everything he asked in his estimates; there is no evidence before us except his mere letter saying that he wants something more. I should like to have had that Postmaster-General come before the Committee on Appropriations and tell us why he wants now seventy-one clerks of the various classes, some at $1,800, some at $1,600, and some at $1,400, when he estimated in the regular estimates that he wanted but sixty-seven. I think he would have difficulty in telling us why he wanted more clerks of the high grades, instead of taking copyists at $900 or clerks of class 1 at $1,200. He did not choose to do that.

If the Senate is going to allow officers of this Government to submit their own estimates and then keep away from the Committee on Appropriations, with ample opportunity to come, and then come in at the last hour and ask additional force, I want the Senate to say so by a yea-and-nay vote. I call for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senator if the Postmaster-General had any intimation from the committee that they desired his presence or further information from him on the subject?

Mr. BECK. We had given him all he asked for.

Mr. FERRY. But I speak in reference to the amendment suggested by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, accompanied by a letter from the Postmaster-General urging the same thing.

Mr. BECK. The letter from the Postmaster-General to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads came into the Senate the day before yesterday, the 14th day of May, as I understand. The bill had been reported back on the 6th.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to say that these amendments were referred to the Committee on Appropriations on the 30th of April by a Senator of this body, myself.

Mr. BECK. And rejected by the committee, of course.

Mr. McDONALD. The committee therefore had from some authority—it may not have been the best authority—the facts before them, that there was a desire for an increase of service in this division of the Post-Office Department of these three clerks. Of course I had no particular desire on the subject; I was not running that establishment; they could not have imagined that I had made this suggestion without some reason for it, and I do not want the blame to rest on the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of not going before the Committee on Appropriations, because when he communicated these facts to me and requested that the amendment be sent to them, I said to him that when they reached that part of the bill I apprehended I should be informed of it and would let him know and go with him to the committee so that he might make his explanation to them as he had made it to me. But I got no intimation from the committee on that subject, and therefore I communicated none to him.

When the bill came back into the Senate there was nothing left, so far as I was concerned, but for me to offer my amendments here and obtain in writing from him a statement of the facts upon which I had offered them before. In the mean time the Postmaster-General had made his application to the proper committee of the Senate, the one in charge of the postal service, and the same amendments came forward from that direction, which was more regular, if regularity is to be observed, perhaps than for me to offer them. But I did not want it to be thought that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was wanting in proper courtesy and respect to the Committee on Appropriations or that he failed in any duty that he thought rested upon him. If there was any one to blame about it, it was myself in not going before that committee without being notified that they were engaged upon the consideration of this branch of the bill.

I repeat again that if the facts now before the Senate, if the statement of the Postmaster-General, if the more particular statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has the immediate direction and control of this branch of the service, furnish to the Senate sufficient information to satisfy the minds of Senators that this increase of force on account of the increase of the service ought to be made, then I apprehend that these amendments ought to be adopted notwithstanding a call is made for the yeas and nays. I am always just as ready to vote upon the yeas and nays as in any other way. I certainly should not advocate any measure here that I was not willing to record my vote in favor of.

Mr. BECK. I find that I made a statement which was not entirely correct as to when the estimates were made. I said to the Senator from Colorado that it was in December last. I had forgotten for the moment the fact that on the 19th day of March, 1879, the day after this Congress met, estimates were sent to us again from the heads of all the Departments; and for the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General seven clerks of class 4 were demanded for the next fiscal year, twenty-six of class 3—we have given twenty-seven—thirteen clerks of class 2; we have given them all they asked and one more. This was on the 19th of March. If the three additional clerks now clamored for so loudly were wanted, was it not the duty of those officers to say so then? Here are their estimates.

Mr. TELLER. Is not that simply a copy of what was sent in December?

Mr. BECK. Whether it was copied or not, if anything more was needed on that day it was their duty to have set it forth. They set forth their wants again, and set forth that they only wanted that many. We have given them all they said they wanted and one more, and we have never heard a word of complaint from them before the Committee on Appropriations of the House or Senate, and we have had copies of their communications to the committee of the House.

Mr. TELLER. Have we not now a call for these extra clerks?

Mr. SAULSBURY. As a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads I am in favor of voting everything by the way of force to that Department which I am satisfied is demanded by the public service; but in my opinion there is no such evidence before the Senate as justifies me in coming to a conclusion that this is demanded. It is true we have a letter from the Postmaster-General representing the necessities of the Department; but it has been shown by the Senator from Kentucky that this is a new want of the Department. I have been in the Senate long enough to know that there has always been since I have been here a demand on the part of the various Departments of the Government for liberal allowances in the shape of clerks and employés. A few years ago when the democrats came into possession of the House of Representatives they sent bills to the Senate cutting down the expenses of the Government some $38,000,000 per annum. A part of that reduction was in the clerical force in the Departments by some four or five hundred; and I remember how the Senator then in charge of the bills and at the head of the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate, the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] contended that it would embarrass the Government, embarrass the Departments, to reduce the force. Yet in a very short time in one of the bureaus, to wit, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, when Mr. McPherson went there, he actually cut down the force far below what the House of Representatives had proposed to cut it down, notwithstanding it had been claimed by the Senator from Minnesota having charge of the appropriation bills of that year that the Government would be embarrassed by the reduction of the force that was proposed by the House.

It is not safe to rely exclusively upon the representations of the wants of a Department made by the gentleman having charge of the Department, because it is very natural to make strong representations. Perhaps if I were in charge of one of the bureaus of a Department, or at the head of one of the Departments, I should want clerical assistance enough to make everything easy and pleasant. But I apprehend if we rely implicitly and exclusively upon the desires and wishes of the heads of Departments we shall increase very largely the force in every Department of this Government. We are here to judge, and to judge by the facts before us, and we are not simply to take without question the wish of an Assistant Postmaster-General or the Postmaster-General himself. He ought to satisfy us by something beyond the mere expression of his wishes in reference to the matter.

I am aware there has been an increase constantly going on in the postal service, but at the same time there has been a large force employed in all the branches of the Post-Office Department, as well as in the other Departments. There is no question that but a few years ago every Department of this Government was filled to overflowing with employés, and that places were found for politicians to put favorites in as employés whom they desired to have provided for. But we have taken a retrograde movement on that score; we have commenced to cut down the force; and we ought not now at this extra session to go on and increase the force beyond what was estimated for at the commencement of the session by the Departments themselves. I will vote with the Committee on Appropriations in this respect.

Mr. PLUMB. There are one or two facts which, if known, will go far to account for the apparent dilatoriness on the part of the Postmaster-General in making this recommendation to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. A post-route bill providing very largely for the service of the Post-Office Department, as has been stated, was passed on the last day of the last session of Congress. I think when we came back here on the 18th of March it had not got into print. My recollection is that I tried to get a copy of the law at that time and it had not been printed. I think, at all events, it had not come seriously under the consideration of the Department. I remember distinctly that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, when I proposed the question of routes in my State to him, expressed great surprise that so many had been established, that is to say, that the total number was so great, being I think about nineteen hundred.

After the act had been brought to the attention of the Department, it took several weeks to examine it and determine upon what portion of the routes it was necessary service should be put. I know that the list for that purpose required to be advertised in the papers of the different States where the routes had been established was not made up until about the 25th day of April, and until that time or about that time no one could know precisely the amount of labor that the adoption of these routes would require. The amount of force needed was, therefore, one of those things that could not be determined until a very late period; and taking the ordinary routine that prevails in the Department, I presume the Postmaster-General himself was not advised until at or about the date of the letter which has been spoken of here, the 14th day of this month, of the necessities of the service for the next year.

In the first place, the necessity is one in the future. It will not take effect—that is to say, it will not have occasioned the full amount of labor—until about the 1st day of October, or at all events until after the beginning of the next fiscal year. Consequently it is a matter of such a nature that undoubtedly in the pressure of current business it may possibly have been overlooked.

There is another point. The Senator from Virginia has spoken of the fact that this progress has been constantly met, as though we had something which having been met would never again have to be met. It is something which will continue to have to be met, and will be one of those emergencies that will constantly be before Congress to be met, not merely this year but next year, and the year thereafter.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator will permit me, he has evidently misunderstood (and it was no doubt my own fault) the idea that I suggested, which was that this increase was no new thing at all. I admit that it is constant and progressive, and that each year it is to be expected; but the knowledge of this fact was in the possession of the Postmaster-General when he made his estimates, and I had a right to assume that those estimates were made upon this estimated increase of the service; especially when he renewed his estimates in March last without asking any additional increase it was to be understood by Congress that the amount asked for was all he expected to require during the year, it being made in full view and with a full knowledge of the increase.

Mr. PLUMB. In my own State there have been added in the last twelve months about four hundred new post-offices. A large portion of these are in a section of the country where before last year there was no population at all.

Mr. WITHERS. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. PLUMB. That increase has thrown upon the Department an enormous increase of business. I do not mean to say that that increase should all be represented by additional help, but a large portion of it undoubtedly should be.

My experience is that there is no other Department of the public service where the people are so careful about the manner in which it is conducted or so desirous that it may be conducted promptly and properly as the Post-Office Department. There is no Department of the Government that the people so much enjoy or to which they will pay money so readily and so cheerfully as for the postal service. I think the service ought not to be stinted; and I think that it cannot be made effective in the field unless it is properly taken care of in the bureaus here.

After all, it seems to me that the only question now is whether the Postmaster-General has done his duty or not. It does not seem to be seriously questioned that this extra service is needed; and ought we not to have it? Shall effect not be given to our legislation simply because the Postmaster-General has been dilatory? I do not care to say whether he has been so or not; I simply say that as the matter stands now there is no denial anywhere made that this service is actually necessary. If that be true, then why should the purpose and object of the increase of the service which Congress has ordered be practically defeated simply on account of the negligence of a bureau officer?

We have the letter of the Postmaster-General. It does not bear the date it should have done, according to the Committee on Appropriations. It ought to have been dated, according to their theory, about the 19th of March; it was not dated in fact until the 14th of May. I can say to Senators that if we stay here four weeks longer the Postmaster-General, if he does his duty, will send another letter wanting more clerks, because in that time he will begin to get some idea of the increase of this service made by Congress for which he is to provide.

Mr. WITHERS. Then we ought to vote it now.

Mr. PLUMB. I think we at least ought to vote now that which we now have the best of evidence is required; and I believe before the end of this fiscal year the Post-Office Department will have arrived at the conclusion that it will still be short of help. I do not know that the Postmaster-General has anticipated it in any particular. I have no doubt he speaks of that which is a duty upon the Department and in view of the exigency upon his Department; and I am satisfied that that exigency will increase every week and every month, and by the time we come back here in December we can get the full effect of the establishment of at least nineteen hundred post-routes, and of the average of more than three or five, perhaps a dozen, post-offices each day in the year, and he will say that he needs more help, and a practical deficiency will be created.

I think, as I said before, it is only a question now whether the Postmaster-General has been sufficiently rapid in making his communication to Congress. There is no question at all but that the service is needed in the Department in order to give effect to what we have heretofore done.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] refers to the magnificent efforts of his party in the House of Representatives in 1876 in the line of economy. He says that they cut down the expenditures of the Government $38,000,000, and that the reduction of the clerical force in the Departments formed a considerable proportion of that reduction. I will not go into the question of that great reduction of $38,000,000. The country has laughed the gentleman and his party out of that a long time ago. The fraud has been exposed. The humbug was exposed at the time, and is fully understood by the country. Instead of a reduction of $38,000,000, it was demonstrated at the time that it was a reduction of but a very few million dollars, if at all; of not over five or six million dollars in fact. The reduction made at that time was not greater in fact than the reductions which had been made for several years before. I presented the figures myself to prove that, and did prove it at the time. That there was a large diminution in the appropriations for public buildings, in refusing appropriations for navy-yards, in refusing the money necessary to carry on the Government, there is not any doubt; but we have made it up at the rate of from ten to fifteen million dollars a year in deficiencies since that time, as has been frequently shown.

But I will not go into that matter. What I rose to say was this: the Senator from Delaware said that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at that time in the Senate protested that this reduction of clerical force in the Departments would cripple the business of the various Departments. I did say so. The House of Representatives sent to the Senate a bill reducing the clerical force in the various Departments about twelve hundred, and the question was contested in the Senate for six weeks. It finally resulted in a diminution of a little less than six hundred. It was when we were protesting against the proposition of the House to reduce the force twelve hundred that I said it would cripple the Government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. WINDOM. I will allow the Senator, certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator will allow me to ask him if after Mr. McPherson went to the head of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing he did not make a further reduction himself voluntarily, and cut down the force that had been allowed by the appropriation act to which reference is made?

Mr. WINDOM. It so happened that the reduction made by that economical House of Representatives did scarcely touch the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It went into all the other Departments and bureaus. Neither they nor we knew of the reductions that could be made. The blow they struck at the various Departments scarcely reached the bureau to which the Senator refers at all. The twelve hundred that they proposed to reduce were from all the other branches; and, as I said, when we finally compromised upon a reduction of about six hundred, I stated that many of the Departments would be crippled in their operations. I say to the Senator that by reason of those reductions the Surgeon-General's Office and the Pension Office were so crippled in their operations that the pensioner was delayed two or three years in getting the settlement of his pension claim, and we have since come in and appropriated I do not know for how many, but I think I am safe in saying that in those two bureaus alone, the Surgeon-General's Office and the Pension Office, we have since that time added more than a hundred clerks.

Mr. WITHERS. My recollection is, if the Senator will permit me, that no reduction was made in the force of the Pension Office.

Mr. WINDOM. The Surgeon-General's Office was largely reduced, and there was some reduction in the Pension Office.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The increase in the Pension Bureau was made necessary because the Senator and some others voted for the arrears of pensions act, which increased the labors of that bureau very largely. If they had voted as I did against that increase, against an increase which I believe was opposed to the interest of the country and not demanded by any act of justice to the pensioners, there would have been no further increase, I apprehend, made necessary in the clerical force of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. WINDOM. I am speaking of the increase made subsequent to this wonderfully economical reduction of which the Senator boasted in 1876. Prior to the passage of the arrears of pensions act there was a very large increase of force made in the Pension Office. We made, too, a very large increase—I cannot state the number, but I am very confident it was between fifty and a hundred—in the Surgeon-General's Office. The Surgeon-General's Office by reason of the reduction, by reason of this economy of which the Senator to-day boasts, got behind in its pension business from a year and a half to two years. We were compelled in various other Departments to add to the clerical force. I do not know what has been done, but I believe I shall be safe in saying that of the six hundred reduction that was then made, of which so great a boast was heard throughout the country, at least 50 per cent. of it we have been compelled to put back since that time. I am confident that there will be found to have been between two and three hundred additional employés added since 1876. I may be mistaken in this, but in those two bureaus alone we added over a hundred.

Now, the Senator from Delaware says that I complained at the time that we were crippling the Government. We did cripple it in those various branches, and we have been doing so all over in every department of the Government since that time. I say to the honorable Senator from Delaware that unless his theory that the Government is to be stopped is carried out, he and his party will be compelled during the next two years to add to the clerical force in the various bureaus of this Government, because they have been cut down too low. They will be compelled to do that or to cripple the various business interests of the country.

That boast of $38,000,000 reduction made in 1876 I thought the Senator would hardly repeat on this floor after all the facts had been demonstrated so often; and yet I am not surprised at his repeating it. When a Senator of his age and experience and ability can rise in his place on the Senate floor and tell us and tell the country, as he did yesterday, that he believed the expenses of this Government could be reduced from thirty to fifty million dollars a year and that he proposed to do it, he is quite competent I think to make the blunder he has made with reference to those reductions in 1876.

The Senator has been in his seat on this floor during the last three years. He believes that the expenses of this Government can be reduced an average of $40,000,000 a year. I appeal to the record for one single motion of his when these bills have been pending during the last three or four years to support the Government, to save the Government this $40,000,000 which he has sat quietly in his seat and seen thrown away. He either speaks with the utmost looseness on this subject when he says that from thirty to fifty million dollars a year can be saved, or he knows what he is talking about. If he does know what he is talking about when he says $40,000,000 can be saved, why has he sat quietly in his seat during the last three or four years and made no effort to save it? The rest of us have not been able to discover it, and the honorable Senator has been sitting here all this time with his eyes wide open, seeing $40,000,000 a year going out of the Treasury of the United States, recklessly squandered, and he never has given us that valuable information which he evidently possessed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator knows full well that when that bill from the House came here proposing to save $38,000,000 I did antagonize by my vote and by my voice the position of the Senator from Minnesota, who labored strenuously to undo and to defeat the reductions which that bill proposed; and he was enabled by the potent influence which he exerted in his party to cut down the savings made by the House from $38,000,000 to something over $29,000,000. He knows that on that very occasion I sought to hold the Senate by my vote to the economy which the House proposed, while his voice was loud and long in trying to deprive the country of the benefit of the economy which was proposed by the House.

So I have time and again repeated the assertion that there was no necessity of an army of twenty-five thousand men here; yet the Senator and his party have been keeping up the Army to that minimum. I would have reduced it, and I would reduce it now if I had the opportunity to reduce it, to not much over twelve or fifteen thousand men; I am not sure but that I would go down to the minimum of ten thousand men; and I would do more, I would retire many of the men who are now officers, on half pay. If they were over the age of fifty years I would retire them on half pay, and if they were under fifty years of age, I would discharge them from service and let them go to work as other people do who have to work for a living. I would economize; and I believe if economy is properly practiced we can save the amount that I stated yesterday could be saved, from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000; and I should be glad to have the co-operation of the Senator from Minnesota and of his party in an honest effort that ought to be made by the democrats to produce that reduction in the expenditures of the Government. The people of the country pay the taxes, every dollar of which we spend, and it is a very onerous matter to many of them to pay those taxes. Yet I say that for several years past there has been a lavish expenditure of money, reckless and regardless of the interests of the men who pay the taxes into the public Treasury.

I have repeatedly raised my voice in this Senate, and the Senator from Minnesota knows it, against the extravagance of his party; and I called upon my party yesterday, and I shall continue to call upon it while I think there is any hope to accomplish it, to carry into practice what we ourselves believe, that there has been an extravagant expenditure of money, and that there ought to be economy in the expenditures of the Government. But whenever we attempt that, the Senator from Minnesota (I doubt not anxious to have the expenditures of the Government under democratic rule as large and oppressive to the people as they were under his party's own administration of the Government) will seek every opportunity to increase the expenses of the Government so that the contrast between a democratic economical government and a republican extravagant government shall not be too apparent. I hope the Senator will join me, and if he does there will be at least two votes in favor of economy in the expenses of the Government.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the only proposition the Senator now suggests for a very large reduction of expenditures is to substantially wipe out the Army of the United States. We have already an Army that is not able to defend the frontiers against the savages, and our soldiers are cut to pieces, because they are in so small numbers, whenever they encounter the red enemies of the country. Now, for one, I do not propose to gratify the Senator's hatred of the Army of the United States by joining him in that sort of economy.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg the Senator's pardon; I have no enmity against the Army of the United States; but I say to him that the course which he and his party are pursuing in persisting to keep the Army in the control of elections at the polls will create a prejudice against the Army that will result to the disadvantage of the Army. I would maintain our Army in the respect and confidence and esteem of the country by confining it to its legitimate purposes. I would not degrade it to the mere office of performing police duties, and more especially to the degradation of having it interfere with the elections. I would keep it within the esteem and respect and confidence of the country; but the policy which the Senator is pursuing in insisting that there shall be an Army to keep control of the elections of this country is calling the attention of the people of the United States to the services which are demanded of that Army: and, mark my prediction, it will result, if it is persisted in, in bringing an odium upon the Army that ought not to be attached to it, and it will result in cutting down the Army, if not in its entire abolition. I would preserve an army sufficient to defend the frontiers, to do all the duty which it is necessary for the military arm of the Government to perform; but I would strip it of the power of interfering with the freemen of this country in casting their votes for whom they please either to make or to execute the laws under which they are to live. The object of the Senator, or at least of his party, I presume, is to have a sufficient army that they may not only defend the frontiers, but that they may defend the interior on the day of election. I am opposed to such service, and I shall go against it.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator has been quite liberal in his interlineations in my speech. I should like to ask him a question. The Senator has spoken of the expenses of the Army in keeping the peace at the polls. Will he be good enough to tell the Senate about what proportion of the expenses of the Army has been incurred in keeping the peace at the polls during the last two years?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am unable to state that; but I will tell the Senator of one little incident that I happen to know something about. I remember that in 1862 when General Wool was in command at Baltimore he received an order from Secretary Stanton to take his army into the State in which I live, and to distribute it at the polls in that State. I saw the troops there. I saw them charge upon the polls where I vote myself, and they scattered the people with fixed bayonets. Three or four steamboats were chartered at Baltimore and taken to Seaford, in Sussex County, in my State, and the troops were distributed through the State, and kept there on the day of election, and they left the next day. I know that that cost something. Now, how much all this interference with elections has cost I am unable to say; but there has been a very large per cent. of the cost, I have no doubt, in that service rendered by the Army, a degrading service, which the officers of the Army feel to be humiliating, and which I call upon the Senator from Minnesota not to impose upon brave officers of the Army. They do not want to do any such drudgery and such political work. They want to defend their country against enemies, not against American citizens and freemen. As I cannot answer the question of the Senator as to how much the Army has cost in this respect, can the Senator answer himself as to how much it has cost to have an army all through the Southern States and in active operation about the time of election?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to hear the answer.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, to keep the peace against the efforts of the democratic party during the time to which the Senator refers cost about $5,000,000,000. That was what it cost the country to keep the peace down there at the time to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator ought not to evade the question. He said he could tell how much it cost to keep the Army at the polls; that is the question, and he cannot evade it in that kind of style.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator, in the first place, spoke about how much we were taxing the country to keep the peace at the polls. I asked him how much it had cost during the last two years, and he replied by telling me of an incident in 1862 in the State of Delaware where he thought it cost something. I believe the governor of the State of Delaware thanked the troops for that opportunity to keep the peace at the polls.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg pardon. That assertion was made by another Senator on this floor. Dr. William Burton was at that time governor and he testified under oath that he never asked for the Army, but on the contrary he did not believe there was any necessity for troops at the polls, that the civil officers of the State were ample to preserve the peace. No, sir, there was no necessity for troops there.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not like to have the Senator go away from the question I asked him. If he wants me to tell what it cost to keep the peace during the four years from 1861 to 1865, I have answered the question. That was not only to keep the peace at the polls in Delaware and in some other places, but to keep the peace which the democratic party were breaking in various localities in the United States, and it was a very expensive operation, extremely so. But I put the question to the Senator how much has it cost during the last two years for the Army to keep the peace at the polls. I think the Senator will be unable to find where a single soldier has been used for that purpose; and yet he gets up here in his place and talks to us about an expensive army because we want to use them to intimidate voters at the polls! That is about as transparent as the claim that $38,000,000 were saved in 1876!

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Minnesota will allow me to say that I have not charged that since Mr. Hayes came into power and withdrew the Army from certain State capitals there has been any military interference at the polls; but the Senator from Minnesota knows that under his honored predecessor the military power of this Government was used in sending troops into different States.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me to interrupt him a moment? I believe it was the general understanding yesterday that this day should be devoted to the business parts of this bill. I respectfully suggest to both Senators, as the Frenchmen say, revenons à nos moutons—let us get to business, and not spend the time in this way.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator from Texas desires to shield the Senator from Delaware I am willing to forego further discussion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I notice that when the Senator from Texas feels disposed to make any speeches in the Senate he generally does it without let or hinderance from anybody. I did not care to be drawn into this controversy. I made a statement which the Senator from Minnesota admitted was true, and then he chose to call my attention to certain other facts.

Now, I wish to say a word in reference to the interference to which the Senator alludes in the State of Delaware. I say there was no more necessity for the presence of any soldiers at the polls on that day than there has been since that time or than there was preceding that time. I was a citizen of the State then; I canvassed the State; I made speeches to the people of the State, and I know there was no disposition on the part of any man with whom I came in contact to have the military interfere; and the interference was sought by neighborhood politicians, and Mr. Stanton co-operated with them in order to try to secure the election for the republican party in that State.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that that interference did not accomplish its purpose; that the democracy of the State of Delaware are generally equal to the emergency, and when you put your Army under provost-marshals we knew what kind of animals they were; and although I had no personal knowledge of it at the time, I have since been informed that in order to secure the right to vote our people bought one of your provost-marshals for $100, so that he would not interfere with them, and thus secured the right to vote. The democracy of Delaware did not put the Army at the polls, they did not want the Army at the polls, and they bought one of your provost-marshals and carried the election, and the State has been democratic ever since.

Mr. WINDOM. I have often heard of the democratic party buying votes before, but I have never heard it openly confessed on the floor of the Senate that they did do it. There is another thing that has often given me a little trouble. I never knew why it was that the Secretary of War was compelled to send soldiers into Delaware in 1862 until the Senator informs us to-day that he stumped the State of Delaware. If he did stump the State at that time I can see why the Army was sent there to keep the peace at the polls. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I heard a moment ago a remark from the Senator from Delaware which attracted my attention. The Senator from Minnesota said, rather by way of inquiry I think, that he believed the governor of Delaware on the occasion to which the Senator from Delaware takes exception had expressed some acknowledgment or thanks because of the presence of the national troops and the security which that presence gave. The Senator from Delaware, not contenting himself with denying that remark, if remark it was, or inquiry, if inquiry it was, of the Senator from Minnesota, declared that he had heard that statement made before and he wished to deny it. Having made some such statement before myself, I feel warranted in supposing that the remark of the Senator from Delaware was aimed at me; and as I mean to make no statement in the Senate the truth of which I do not believe, and as I mean also not to trust myself in a matter of contest without some evidence on which to base my statement, I beg to bring to the notice of the Senate a part of the evidence upon which I spoke. I have here a report made on the 12th of February, 1864, made by the Military Committee of the Senate, made not by the chairman of that committee, as I heard it once stated, but by a Senator not living now, then a Senator from the State of Michigan, Mr. Howard. Appended to this report are documents, then fresh in date, concerning topics then notorious and widely understood, official documents which it is not likely were garbled, misquoted, or forged. From this report first I will read a few words:

> The contrast of the conduct of the governor of Delaware and of the governor of Maryland will fitly close this report.
>
> The latter—
>
> That is, the governor of Maryland—
> treated the order * * * as an insult to the loyalty of Maryland, and an usurpation against her laws.
> The former—
>
> That is, the governor of Delaware—> accepted the order as the best expression of the wishes of the loyal people, glad to receive aid in preserving the ballot-box from rebel votes; and added at its foot his exhortation to the good people and officers of Delaware to aid in its enforcement, and stamped his approbation by affixing the seal of the State.
> The Legislature of Delaware, at their session in March, 1863, under the control of a political party hostile to the principles on which the present administration came into power—
>
> That was the administration of Abraham Lincoln—
> and acting under the passions inspired by the report of a joint committee of the two houses to take proofs of the "interference"—

"Interference" is quoted. It was almost as stereotyped, as monotonous, as worn, and as soiled a word in the partisan vocabulary then as it has come to be again now—> take proofs of the "interference" of the Federal military officers in the election in that State of the preceding year, passed a very stringent and penal act for the punishment of such interference. We append a copy of this act, marked H. The committee, in their voluminous report, seem blind to the fact that a state of things existed in Delaware not less deplorable than that which prevailed in Kentucky, and evince the same bitter hostility to the National Administration, its principles and policy—a hostility not surpassed in its style of denunciation even by the rebel journals published at Richmond. The following extract will be sufficient to characterize the whole document.

> The extract is quoted:
> Your committee might, perhaps, with propriety here close their report, submitting the facts elicited without further comment, to the General Assembly and people of the State, as conclusive of a deliberate design and purpose on the part of the leading republican politicians of the State, and an unscrupulous and despotic administration at Washington to invade the sovereignty of Delaware, and trample under foot the most sacred right of her citizens. The great indignity, however, offered to the State by the Federal authorities in the invasion of her soil by Federal soldiery for the purpose of influencing the result of an election, will justify the committee in expressing, in conclusion, their unqualified condemnation, both of the action of the Federal Administration and the traitorous conspirators among our own citizens, who, for partisan purposes alone, sought to defeat the fair expression of the popular will at the polls by the potent influence of Federal bayonets.
> The relations of State and Federal authority are too plainly defined by the written Constitution that gives to the General Government every power which it can rightfully exercise, and are too well understood by the people of the whole country to permit your committee, even in the exercise of the most liberal charity, to ascribe this great outrage to the ignorance and imbecility of the novices at Washington.

"The ignorance and imbecility of the novices at Washington!" That tempts me to pause and remember the names of that group of "novices" at which this heavy shot is fired. At their head stood Abraham Lincoln; next stood William H. Seward; then came Salmon P. Chase; then came Edwin M. Stanton; and then followed the others whose names are not forgotten. "The eyes of Delaware" were upon such men when a joint committee of the two houses of the Legislature of that sovereign State withered them by calling them "novices" and speaking of their "ignorance and imbecility!"

> Influenced by party considerations alone, the Federal Administration, disregarding the limitations upon Federal power plainly written in the Constitution of the country, has been guilty before the whole country of invading one of the smallest States of the Union, not at the instance and request of the constituted authorities of the State, but at the solicitation of corrupt and unscrupulous neighborhood politicians. If this administration had done no previous wrongful act; if its history had been marked by a strict regard for constitutional obligations; if it had not unnecessarily plunged the whole country in ruinous civil war; if it had built no bastiles; deprived no man of his liberty; suspended no writs of habeas corpus; muzzled no presses, nor invaded the right of free thought and free speech, this single act of invading one of the feeblest States of the Union, for no other purpose than to determine the result of her local election, is, and ought to be, sufficient to brand it with infamy and everlasting disgrace. Reprehensible, however, as has been the action of the powers at Washington, its criminality finds a parallel in the disgraceful, wicked, damning treachery of the ingrate conspirators in our own midst, who, with malign hearts and lying lips, assured the Administration of the necessity for its interference with the domestic concerns of Delaware, and by deception and falsehood gave the excuse to irresponsible power for the outrage and wrong of which your committee complain. No language could betray their baseness.

Judging from the elegance of this style I think the word "betray" is an error; it is intended for "portray," and I venture to interpolate that, as it somewhat finishes and rounds out the style of this patriotic document.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Probably the pen of the Senator from Delaware slipped.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend on my right speaks of a pen too distinguished to be named and says that it probably slipped when it came to this focal point in a great climax:

> No language could betray their baseness. No time can efface their guilt or remove the stigma from their memory. Your committe will, therefore, turn from objects so loathing, and leave them to the judgment of their fellow-men, objects of contempt and scorn.

Mr. President, I must think that had it occurred to me some days ago to read this report as an assistance, an inspiration, to some of the Senators who have decorated with ornaments of discourse this debate, it would have been a kindly service.

Here follow exhibits, being a proclamation from the governor of Delaware and other official papers, which, I think, without reading them, and without adding them to so much as I have already read, may gain for me some extenuation at least, if not a critical justification, for having declared that when national authority entered the State of Delaware to see that men who adhered to the Union and believed in it were permitted to vote, the governor of that State affixing its great seal to the order and approving it, was in accord with the act.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from New York is laboring under a misapprehension as to who was governor at the time of this military invasion of our State. I am fully aware that the gentleman who was elected governor that fall by the aid of the military power was in harmony with the views of the Federal Administration; but at the time the invasion of the State was made, in the fall of 1862, William Burton was the governor of the State, and William Cannon was the republican candidate for governor of the State. Now, it was William Cannon, a year after that, or more than a year after that, who is quoted there as the governor of the State. Dr. William Burton testified before that same committee that he was not notified of any application or any desire on the part of any person to have troops sent to the State; that he never asked the Federal authorities to send troops into the State, and that he did not desire them, and did not believe they were necessary. He was the governor at the time; so that I am sure the Senator from New York was mistaken if he intended to convey the idea that the governor at the time approved the act. It is true the governor who was afterward elected, and elected by means of this interference, approved it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. This is a matter of date, and certainly we ought to be able to fix it. Was not the Senator from Delaware speaking of what took place in his State in 1862?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Does not this report refer to what took place in 1862?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir. I will tell the Senator that the record he quoted was the report made by an investigating committee, but he says the governor of the State approved this act. Now, it was not the governor of the State at the time that invasion took place, but the governor who was elected by the aid of this interference afterward gave it his indorsement, and that occurred after the election of 1863. In the fall of 1863 we had a special election for a Representative in Congress. Charles Brown, who once represented the city of Philadelphia in the lower House of Congress, and who is known to the country, was the democratic candidate, and he canvassed the State. Two days before the election Mr. Schenck, then in command in the military department of Maryland and Delaware, was sent for and came to Delaware, and there, in conclave with this same Governor Cannon and other leading republicans, formulated an oath, as regulating the right to vote, to be prescribed for every man whose right to vote the republicans should choose to question or whose loyalty they should choose to question. We had a clear majority of from five hundred to a thousand, and it was known. This military commander, bringing his military force, came there to prescribe the qualifications of the electors, the democratic electors of Delaware; and our people, with a unanimity of which I am proud, notwithstanding we had not forty-eight hours' notice that such a conspiracy had existed in order to deprive us of the right to vote, communicated with each other throughout the State and retired almost to a man from the polls. But thirteen democratic votes were cast; and why? Because the democracy of Delaware would never consent to acknowledge the right of a military commander to prescribe the qualifications of the electors of Delaware.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what were the qualifications that he prescribed?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have not the oath before me. I can get it and present it. It makes no difference, however; the constitution of the State prescribes the qualifications of electors in Delaware.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The constitution of that State, originally proclaimed two months and a half after the Declaration of Independence, on the 21st day of September, 1776, and afterward remodeled in 1792, and again in 1831, prescribes and fixes the qualifications of voters; and we claimed the right to vote under our constitution, not by the interposition of a military commander.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I wanted to ask was, not whether General Schenck had any legal right to do what he did or not. The Senator said that he came there and prescribed certain qualifications. Now, I want to have the Senator tell us what it was that General Schenck prescribed. Was it not a requirement that the enemies of the United States should not vote, and that men should swear that they were not enemies in order to vote?

Mr. SAULSBURY. "Enemies of the United States!" The Senator from Vermont ought to be familiar enough with the history of his country to know that there were no enemies of the Government of the United States in the State of Delaware. Where is the law that we did not obey? Where is the requisition by the Government for men or money that we did not meet? Talk about the enemies of the Government! I beg the Senator's pardon. He is not an ignorant man; he is a learned man; he is familiar with the history of his country, and he knows that there was not a single obligation which the people of Delaware owed to the Government under which they lived that they did not perform. We met every draft that was made upon us; we paid every tax imposed upon us; and we performed every duty that we owed to the Government; but we took the liberty as democrats to criticise the arbitrary arrests which were made; we took the liberty to express our own sentiments as democrats and as men not in hostility to the Government, because our Legislature had declared, the very Legislature that made that report had declared, by solemn resolution in the spring of 1861 or 1862 that they would adhere to the Government. They condemned in most emphatic terms secession, and declared their purpose to remain in the Federal Union and to abide by it. I drew the resolutions myself, and I know what they uttered—resolutions that Hon. Henry Wilson afterward told me he had placed in his book as a part of the record of the history of Delaware in the rebellion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I wanted to know was, not what the Legislature of Delaware did, but what General Schenck did, and whether the qualification, as the Senator calls it, or oath, that he prescribed was not of the nature that I have spoken of. I am not speaking of its effect or its legality. I want to get at the fact.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not remember the precise language of the military order prescribing an oath, but I tell the Senator it was a conspiracy on the part of leading republicans—and only a few of the leading republicans, I am glad to say—with General Schenck to defeat the election of a democratic Congressman, because General Schenck knew, and the men with whom he conspired knew, that the sons of Delaware were—

> Men who their duties know,
> And know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain, and would never consent to let a military chieftain prescribe their qualifications to vote. Their constitution, the constitution adopted by their fathers, prescribed the qualifications to vote, and they did not claim any right to vote outside of the qualifications prescribed by their constitution, and they would never submit to have, and ought not to submit to have, their qualifications prescribed by a military chieftain.

Sir, General Schenck has met in the estimation of his countrymen and in the estimation of the world his just deserts. After having been honored by the republican party with one of the first missions of this country, he was dragged home on charges framed against him in having connected himself with sales of the Emma mine stock. Disgracing his country, he was called home to meet those charges. I do not mean that he was called home by the Government, but he came home to meet those charges, if he could, which were preferred against him before a committee of Congress. Sirs, that man's memory may be respected by politicians; but honest men in America and in Europe will condemn his conduct while abroad; and those who know of his nefarious conduct toward the people of the State of Delaware will mark it as one of the acts of the greatest criminality of which he or any other man could be guilty.

I rose, however, to correct the erroneous impression under which the Senator from New York seemed to be laboring, that the governor of the State at the time indorsed and approved this act. That is not true, and hereafter I may take occasion to bring that matter before the Senate, and to bring forward the testimony of Governor Burton to show that he disapproved the act and that he declared there was no necessity for it. I admit that the man who succeeded him, the man who was elected by the aid of Federal bayonets, did indorse and approve that act; but, sir, he was not the governor of the State of Delaware at the time, nor was he a governor of the State that would ever have filled the office but for the military invasion which he commended.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, had I known that the Senator from Delaware intended to say that some governor of Delaware who had not been stated to have approved this act had approved it, I should have made no issue with him, because there would have been none. My statement originally, as far as I made one, was that the governor of Delaware, thereby of course meaning the governor at the time when the approval in question was given, gave such approval. If I understand the Senator from Delaware he wants to establish that some other governor at some other time did not give an approval. Of course no language that I used could have implied that he did. There can, I think, be no question of the date or of the persons who at that date took part in this proceeding. I have before me an act entitled, "An act to secure the freedom of elections in this State," passed at Dover, March 25, 1863. That date now is clearly fixed; it is the third month in 1863. The preceding general election had taken place in the autumn before. That was the autumn of 1862 indubitably. Now, let me read the preamble:

> Whereas the constitution of this State declares that "all elections shall be free and equal;" and whereas the freedom of elections and the free enjoyment of the right of suffrage according to the constitution and laws of the State are essential to the enjoyment of public liberty; and whereas evil-disposed persons did cause armed soldiers to be brought into this State and to be present at different voting places in the State on the day of the last general election.

That indubitably is the election of the fall of 1862. At that election troops were present in Delaware. They were present under the authority of an order which I hold in my hand; and speaking of that order and of its execution my statement was that the governor of Delaware approved of it. That is true, for here is the evidence that he gave his approval and solemnized that approval by affixing at the foot of the order the great seal of the State. Now what technicality is it with which the honorable Senator from Delaware arrests the Senate? It is that this approval was given by the governor who was governor when he gave it, and it was not given by some other man who was not governor at that time! Very well; I leave that issue in its length and breadth.

The Senator from Delaware had difficulty in remembering what the obnoxious tests were that were applied to the loyal people of Delaware who so loved what the Senator from Connecticut calls this confederated republic that they went forward with a bound and laid their offering upon the altar of the nation. He had difficulty in remembering the tests and criteria which did so betangle and perplex these law-loving people of Delaware.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. I, so far as I remember, never called this a "confederated republic." A much greater man than I, one George Washington, in 1789, called it a great confederated republic.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my honorable friend out of his copious vocabulary now furnish me with a proper appellation for this system of government which the two sides of this Chamber are now vying with each other to perpetuate?

Mr. EATON. Does my friend want to know what I regard it?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish from the highest authority the real name.

Mr. EATON. I am glad you come to the proper authority. I call it, sir, a representative republic of sovereign States.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, what were the tests which so perplexed men in Delaware longing to uphold "a representative republic of sovereign States?" That is what I want to read to the Senate.

Mr. EATON. I wish you would, sir. It is good reading, no doubt.

Mr. CONKLING. And I will read from an authority dear to the democratic party, a name enshrined in the recollection of my friend from Connecticut, which for aught I know is now one of the treasures of the democratic party; I mean Abraham Lincoln, the chief "novice" of that group whose "imbecility and ignorance" in the estimation of the Legislature of Delaware, colossal as it was, was not so great at to account for the preposterous blunders and violations of the Constitution of which they are guilty.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 2, 1863.

SIR:—

This is a letter written to the governor of Maryland; that is, to the man who was governor when this letter was written, not to some other man who was not governor then but became governor in future years or had been governor some time in the past; but to the man who was then governor of Maryland this letter appears to have been addressed:

Yours of the 31st ultimo was received yesterday about noon, and since then I have been giving most earnest attention to the subject-matter of it. At my call General Schenck has attended, and he assures me it is almost certain that violence will be used at some of the voting places on election day, unless prevented by his provost guards.

They are the "animals," if I understood the word aright, to which the honorable Senator from Delaware made so suitable an allusion.

He says that at some of those places the Union voters will not attend at all, or run a ticket, unless they have some assurance of protection. This makes the Missouri case of my action, in regard to which you express your approval.

It appears that this democratic governor of Maryland had expressed his approval of keeping the peace at the polls by troops, but that was in Missouri, in order that it might be fulfilled as was spoken by the spelling-book a great many years ago—"it makes so much difference whose ox is gored."

The remaining point of your letter is a protest against any person offering to vote being put to any test not found in the laws of Maryland. This brings us to a difference between Missouri and Maryland. With the same reason in both States, Missouri has, by law, provided a test for the voter with reference to the present rebellion, while Maryland has not. For example, General Trimble, captured fighting us at Getteysburgh, is, without recanting his treason, a legal voter by the laws of Maryland.

I stop to say that I hope no sensitive Senator on the other side will think that I am fanning the dying embers, rekindling the smoldering fires, or reviving the sectional strifes—I believe I have employed all the pet words to be found for that subject now in the democratic vocabulary—by reading what Mr. Lincoln says:

For example, General Trimble, captured fighting us at Gettysburgh, is, without recanting his treason, a legal voter by the laws of Maryland. Even General Schenck's order admits him to vote, if he recants upon oath. I think that is cheap enough. My order in Missouri, which you approve, and General Schenck's order here, reach precisely the same end. Each assures the right of voting to all loyal men, and whether a man is loyal, each allows that man to fix by his own oath. Your suggestion that nearly all the candidates are loyal—

There is great beauty in that when you stop to reflect upon it, Mr. President, that "nearly all the candidates are loyal." Only think of the touching tribute it was to this "representative republic" made up of "sovereign States," think what a touching tribute Maryland paid to this republic when in nominating candidates for Congress a majority of them were loyal! Only a minority of the candidates at that time were those giving aid and comfort to an attempt to overthrow the Government and prostrate this "representative republic!"

Your suggestion that nearly all the candidates are loyal, I do not think quite meets the case. In this struggle for the nation's life—

You see he fell into the blunder of thinking it was a nation; but that was before my honorable friend from Connecticut had formulated as he has done to-day:

In this struggle for the nation's life, I cannot so confidently rely on those whose election may have depended upon disloyal votes. Such men, when elected, may prove true, but such votes are given them in the expectation that they will prove false. Nor do I think that to keep the peace at the polls, and to prevent the persistently disloyal from voting, constitutes just cause of offense to Maryland. I think she has her own example for it. If I mistake not, it is precisely what General Dix did when your excellency was elected governor. I revoke the first of the three propositions in General Schenck's General Order No. 53, not that it is wrong in principle, but because the military being, of necessity, exclusive judges as to who shall be arrested, the provision is liable to abuse. For the revoked part I substitute the following:

That all provost-marshals and other military officers do prevent all disturbance and violence at or about the polls, whether offered by such persons as above described, or by any other person or persons whatsoever.

The other two propositions of the order I allow to stand. General Schenck is fully determined, and has my strict order besides, that all loyal men may vote, and vote for whom they please.

Your obedient servant,

A. LINCOLN,
President of the United States.

His Excellency A. W. BRADFORD,
Governor of Maryland.

Then the report says:

The governor thought fit to publish a proclamation assailing the order (No. 53) for illegality and usurpation, of which the following is a copy.

Such were the tests. I read this report merely as a memorandum to refresh the somewhat faded memory of the honorable Senator from Delaware; although not an original memorandum but a printed copy, I presume it is competent in this forum to refer to it to refresh the recollection of what is bygone.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the Senator from New York is an adroit debater, and he has manifested his skill on this occasion as much as is customary perhaps with him on other occasions. The point in issue was not whether there had been an order promulged by General Schenck in Maryland, or whether there was a modification of that order by President Lincoln. The point which I rose first to disabuse the minds of Senators, if they really labored under it, was that the governor of the State of Delaware at the time of the invasion of that State by armed force for the purpose of controlling our elections never did approve, as I understood to have been asserted, of that military invasion. I simply rose to correct what seemed to be a misapprehension on the part of the Senator to whom I replied, the Senator from Minnesota, and I alluded to what had been said by the Senator from New York simply to correct what I supposed to be an inadvertence into which both had fallen. After having made the statement which I did that Dr. William Burton was at that time the governor, and that at the election at which these bayonets were used about the polls William Cannon was declared elected and took his seat the January following, I supposed that settled the matter. The remarks of the Senator from New York were calculated to make an impression on the country that the governor of the State at the time approved the act. I did not want that impression to go out, and it was for that reason that I rose to correct what seemed to be a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from New York.

But the Senator has gone off with that adroitness for which he is remarkable. When I called attention to the fact that General Schenck, in the State of Delaware, which had performed all its duties to the Government, came there forty-eight hours before the special election for members of Congress in 1863, and that he prescribed an oath to be administered whenever a challenge was made by any politician of the opposite side, the Senator switches off from that issue to read us what took place in the State of Maryland. I have nothing to say about the State of Maryland. Her Senators here are able to take care of her.

Mr. CONKLING. The orders were the same.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not remember whether they were or not. I am under the impression, however, that Mr. Lincoln never saw the order as to Delaware——

Mr. CONKLING. It was all in one and the same military department, and the orders all came from the same headquarters.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall take occasion before the debate is through, if I can lay my hands on it anywhere in the city, to bring here the report of the Legislature of my State on that subject, and to bring also the order—I believe it was order No. 55. Will the Senator from New York be kind enough to give me the number of the order of General Schenck from the document before him.

Mr. CONKLING. The Maryland order was No. 53 and this, it is very likely, was 54 or 55.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My impression is that the order prescribing the oath in Delaware was No. 55.

Mr. CONKLING. No doubt it was. It was one of the same series of orders.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not think that order was ever seen by Mr. Lincoln; but I do not care whether it was seen by Mr. Lincoln or anybody else. The point I make is that a military commander has no power under this Government to prescribe the qualifications of electors and to keep from the polls men who do not comply with his military decrees. That is the point I make, and I am sure that the Senator from New York, as a lawyer, as a man familiar with the Constitution of his country, cannot rise in his place before this country and proclaim it as his opinion that a military chief is possessed of power, in a State where the laws are obeyed, in a State in harmony with the Federal Union, in a State where the Federal courts and the State courts are open, to prescribe, fix, and determine by military order the qualifications of electors. I am sure the Senator from New York will not say the action of that military chief is defensible. It cannot be justified by any facts existing in the State of Delaware at that time. I shall not be led into a discussion of what may have been the state of facts in Maryland, or in Kentucky, or in Missouri, or in any other State; but I say that there were no facts existing in the State of Delaware at that time which justified any interference by a military officer with the election in our State, whether by military order or by posting troops at the polls.

I said something about provost-marshals. I did not refer to the regular provost-marshals connected with the staff of General Schenck.

The provost-marshals I spoke of were men extemporized for the occasion—citizens of the State; some of them men of degraded character; a large number of them men without character, bankrupt in fortune and in reputation. They were the men who had charge of General Wool's forces after they were brought into my State, one of whom, as I before remarked, was by some of the citizens of our State, in the lower county of the State, as I have been informed, actually bought for $100 to give them permission to vote.

Mr. WINDOM. Was that a citizen of Delaware that the citizens of Delaware bought or an officer of the Army?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It was a provost-marshal, and all the provost-marshals were men who were citizens of the State, or claimed to be citizens of the State—not the regular provost-marshals; they were temporary appointees, selected for the purpose of controlling the election; men who were politicians and not military officers.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator whether they are all purchasable in his State?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator ought to have too much good sense to ask such a question.

Mr. WINDOM. I only judge by those we have heard of as samples.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator ask if all the people of my State are purchasable?

Mr. WINDOM. The samples the Senator gives were purchasable.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator that there are men there who would scorn the offer of a bribe fully as much as the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. I certainly did not mean to say that all the people of Delaware were purchasable or to ask that question. I only meant to ask whether all officers in charge were like that man to whom the Senator has referred.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not mean while I am in the Senate that the Senator from Minnesota shall cast an aspersion, either directly or by implication, against the people of my State without hurling back the imputation with that scorn and contempt which it deserves.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I cast no aspersion. He had given us a sample brick, and I asked him if the other officers were of the same kind.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understood the Senator—I may have misunderstood his remark—to apply his question to all the people of Delaware.

Mr. WINDOM. I can ask whether what the Senator has described as occurring there then was the usual tactics employed by the democratic party in Delaware?

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as that is concerned I say this: the democratic party of the State of Delaware is generally equal to emergencies. [Laughter.] And when you send your military officers there and place them under the control of rapscallions, we will fight them in any way possible so that we secure the right to vote. We succeeded in that election and saved our State, and we have had the Legislature of our State from 1856 to the present time, and your illegal acts at our elections with military orders prescribing the qualifications of electors, your orders surrounding the polls with the military power of the Government, have greatly aided in keeping Delaware true in the line. While ever there is a man in Delaware who remembers the outrageous conduct of your party in surrounding our polls with military power, while ever the present generation remember that a military commander came into the State of Delaware and prescribed the qualifications of her electors to vote, they will enter their protest by voting largely the democratic ticket and keeping that State at least in honest hands.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say one other thing. When I referred to General Schenck, I was not aware that he was on a bed of sickness. If I had known that, I certainly should have said nothing that could have been considered unkind of a man who is on a sick-bed. I have since been informed that he is now confined to a bed of sickness, and perhaps to a bed of death. I regret, therefore, that I made any allusion whatever to General Schenck under these circumstances, and I feel it due to myself that I should make this public acknowledgment that I would not have made those remarks had I known he had not been a well man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it might be added also as to General Schenck, that, acting as any honorable man would who heard that imputations on his official conduct were made before a committee of one of these bodies, he made haste to get leave of absence to come here and meet his accusers, and that he did meet them with success, and was vindicated in the eyes of all honorable men so far as any intention of wrong or participation in wrong was concerned. That also may be due to General Schenck, whether he be sick or well.

Mr. President, it appears from the statement of my friend from Delaware that in the election of 1862 or 1863 a governor was elected who appears to have approved of whatever use of military power was made in that State. If the democratic party carried the State at that election, they must have elected the man that approved of the act, for the honorable Senator says they have held the State ever since.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say to the Senator that the gubernatorial candidate of the republican party was elected in 1862, but a majority of the Legislature was democratic and so was the member of Congress elected, and the county officers were democratic.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know who was the democratic candidate for governor at that election. Was it Dr. Burton for re-election?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; Dr. Burton was not. A gentleman by the name of Jefferson, one of the most honored citizens of the State, was the candidate, a man who had never taken any very active part in politics, living in the county of New Castle, with whose private character I am not so familiar as my colleague, but whom I know to have been a gentleman of the very highest personal character and a warm personal friend of my colleague.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I should like to know whether the republican candidate that was elected was not a man of good private character?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, I have nothing to say against Governor Cannon. He is now dead. Whatever may be my own judgment of his acts or my own judgment of his private life, I should not feel at liberty here to say a word against him, because he is in his grave. I have my own opinion, but I will not express it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. It seems he was elected, and it seems that a majority of the Legislature was elected by the democrats. I am told that they have a somewhat peculiar—perhaps not very peculiar—arrangement in Delaware by which its three counties each elect a certain arbitrary number, not based upon population, and that consequently the voice of the counties taken separately in choosing members of the Legislature would not necessarily represent the voice of the whole State voting on a general ticket for governor. Therefore under the laws of Delaware it is true the governor may have been honestly elected by one party, while the Legislature may have been honestly elected by another.

But that is not very material. The effort of the Senator from Delaware has been to condemn the present republican party and the present republican President in respect of not extending the act of 1865 about keeping the peace at the polls still further than it was extended in 1865 by lopping off one of its exceptions, on the ground that in 1862 the republican President of the United States and the generals of the United States and the republican party generally were guilty of a gross enormity by exerting power in the State of Delaware.

Now, sir, I should like to have the Senator from Delaware tell me, if he is willing, candidly, (as of course he will if he tells me at all,) what he would have wished to have done in that State, he being a loyal citizen, if it is not offensive to call a man loyal, being on the side of his Government, if on that occasion he had feared or believed that there were a sufficient number of his fellow-citizens of that State who were enemies of their country who wanted it broken up, who wished the confederacy to succeed, and who intended to elect members of Congress and State officers who would help break down the Government, would he have thought that those enemies of their country ought to vote?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator that he is putting a case that did not exist. I lived then, as I do now, in the State of Delaware, and I know from personal knowledge that there was no treason there. There were not in the whole State, so far as I have any knowledge, one dozen men that went into the confederate service from Delaware. We were cut off by the bay and the ocean from the Southern States. We knew that our interest was to remain in the Union. We had no disposition to sever our connection with the Federal Union; and there never was any occasion whatever to send any troops into the State of Delaware except to control our elections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend has not answered the question because he says it does not apply. We could find out better if first we could establish the principle of what could be done in such an emergency, and then see whether there was any emergency to apply it to.

I infer that the honorable Senator, if he had had the sentiments that I have imputed to him and had felt the fear and had the belief that I have suggested that some citizens of the State of Delaware did have, and not a few of them, would have been glad to urge every power that could be exerted by the National Administration to preserve that State to its loyal citizens and in the hands of them; and in a time of that emergency I do not think the Senator—taking his own statement to-day about how he would manage the democratic party—would have hesitated much if an additional oath had been prescribed beyond what the constitution of that State, made in ancient times, prescribed for such an event. In other words, I think he would have united with all the loyal citizens of Delaware and have invited the President of the United States, then exerting the military power under martial law in all parts of the country that were at all affected by such questions, to strain the Constitution of the United States, if you please, to the point of keeping that State from destroying itself and going over to the enemy.

That Mr. Lincoln believed there was this danger, and that there was a large number of voters under the constitution of Delaware who were the enemies of their country and meant to break it down, nobody who believes Mr. Lincoln to have been an upright magistrate and an honest man can doubt after what the Senator from New York has read from him on exactly the same subject and at the same time. So, then, it comes right back to the old question of whether the United States in the emergency in which she was placed was justified in the eyes of the civilized world and in the eyes of Delaware—which is much the same thing I suppose—in resorting to the measure the President did. Suppose he was not justified in point of law, who would not excuse an act of that kind if it was necessary to the safety of that State?

The Senator from Delaware says that its people were all loyal. Then if its people were all loyal in that time of dire emergency which the Senator remembers, in 1862-'63 when it looked as if our gallant southern friends were going to be altogether too much for us—they were almost impregnable, we could not break in upon them, and everything seemed to be going to pieces—if that people were as loyal as the Senator thinks they were, if the democrats were as loyal as the republicans, it would not have hurt them much to have come up and taken the oath and voted, although it was an extra-constitutional oath, under such circumstances. It is very strange, indeed, among a mass of loyal men who were eager to maintain the honor and unity of their country, that all the voters of one party should be willing to take this extra test and all the voters of another party were so very notional on the subject of State rights that they could not do it. I should suspect, and I think a jury of twelve men obtained on the theory of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] by alternate drawings could be got, if we could have my friend from Delaware to sum up on that side, to say that the men who refused to take that oath—a great many of them, at any rate enough to overawe and influence the others—did not take it because they could not with absolute truth.

But that is of very little consequence to this present question. It is only of consequence as showing that when you wish now to make a new law and to say that on election day the troops shall not be used for any purpose connected with keeping the peace in the United States under any possible safeguards, the abuses which you desire to correct, the tyranny that you wish to resent, occurred in the midst of a tremendous struggle for national existence seventeen years ago.

There is another thing, Mr. President, that might be mentioned, which is a little characteristic, which the frankness of my honorable friend has set forth. The democratic party, it seems, on that occasion or the next one of the special elections—I have forgotten which—there being provost-marshals, &c., there who were to prevent disloyal citizens from voting the democratic ticket, proceeded to buy one of them in order to get the right to vote. Why was it necessary to buy a provost-marshal of the United States in order to allow citizens to vote, when he was only told to prevent disloyal citizens from voting? And the consequence of the purchase the Senator says was that they carried the State.

I must assume, therefore, that this particular purchased provost-marshal did not exclude the disloyal voters, and the democratic party, as usual whenever any bribery goes on, got the benefit of it, just as they did in Cincinnati last year at the election—I believe it was stated by the late Senator from Ohio (Mr. Matthews) in one of the last speeches he delivered in this body describing the operations that went on in Cincinnati at the last election;—just as it was under Tammany in the city of New York. Wherever "the devil" finds anything "for idle hands to do," in the way of bribing the officials of elections, certainly in Delaware it appears the democratic party gets the benefit of it, and on the ground that the Senator boldly avows that whatever is necessary to be done in order to preserve the ascendency of that party will be done, be it bribery or whatever. That is the case that is stated.

But fortunately, Mr. President, for the good name of the provost-marshals who were employed in that State, citizens of it, it appears that out of all the great number that the Senator speaks of only one could be found who would accept the bribe and let in the disloyal votes. That speaks well for Delaware, Mr. President. It will turn out so in my belief all over the United States. While you will find in some great cities and in some places of that sort supervisors of election under the existing laws who, like their fellow-men, are open to bribery, and who like their fellow-men when they are bribed are bribed by somebody else in the interest of some party that is to get the benefit of it, nevertheless you will find that the great majority of them, as it is with Senators, and judges, and jurors, and all the other people of this country, are honest men and intend to do their duty honestly and to do no more. That is what I believe will turn out; and I say that in reference to what the Senator from Connecticut stated yesterday in respect of the list that he read from some newspaper of a great number, a dozen or more, of vagabonds who in a city of a million inhabitants in some of its lower wards happened to be persons who were keepers of disreputable places of all sorts.

I venture two of those very persons and their associates in those same wards of that city were fair representatives of a large class of the very voters that they were called upon to supervise; and if you go upon the true theory of a democratic government they were the very men to employ. I do not state that, but that would seem to be the theory upon which we are to proceed; and in a certain sense there is a good deal of practical value in it. If in some one ward in a great city of a million inhabitants, one-quarter of whose houses are groggeries, gambling-houses, junk-shops, panel-houses and other houses with names too vile to be mentioned in this presence, that body of men are engaged at all times when elections come around in stuffing ballot-boxes, in cheating in the count, in getting up fights about the polls in order to keep quiet and peaceable citizens from coming to vote, there would be some sense if you could take the best of that class of people who know all these fellows to watch them, to challenge them, to spot them, and to stop them. Then you have only fulfilled the old adage of "setting a thief to catch a thief." They are the men who would know them best.

I am not defending such appointments; but I say that when in a great city it happens that in a class of population of that character you have some people connected with the administration of affairs who are just like the people whose affairs are to be administered, there is not any great cause of complaint about that. There is great cause of complaint that such people should be allowed to have any voice, either they or their fellows, in the administration of a government of honest and free men; and that is what these election laws are designed and destined to keep; and, that is, to take from the most reputable of the citizens of the respective localities people of independence and honesty, take them from both parties, and let the representative best men of both parties see to it that there is fair play and honest voting and honest counting on both sides. When you do that and carry it into effect all over this country, it is of very little consequence what names you call parties, whether democrats or republicans or what not. Each party will then, when it is in power, be the party of honest government, of true liberty. And yet our friends on the other side are determined to overthrow these safeguards, on the theory, I suppose, of State sovereignty, that Congress has no business to interfere in the election of members of the House of Representatives and that it is to be left to the local authorities composed in some of these great cities, as I have shown and as everybody knows as a matter of public history and notoriety, of the class of people I have described, to turn the scale one way or the other in all national elections. Well, you can try it provided you can pass your laws.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator from Illinois proceeds, I desire to give notice that after he is through—not, however, while he is speaking—the speeches hereafter made shall be made, if I can hold gentlemen to the point of order, on the question whether there shall be three additional clerks in the Post-Office Department. The bargain was made that we should sit until four o'clock to-day on business and on Monday for political discussion. After the Senator from Illinois is done I shall then insist that we go on with the business we agreed to go on with to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate very long; but I cannot withhold a word in response to the remarks that fell from the lips of the Senator from Delaware. It has become fashionable to make thrusts right and left at persons in this country who did that which they considered to be their duty in maintaining the supremacy of this great Government of ours. Officers and soldiers of the Army have frequently been sneered at in this Chamber. It has been thrust in our faces that the republicans have given to those who served in the Army a representation of but four in numbers in this Chamber; and the boast has been made that the opposition have given so many more to certain soldiers because they fought for a different cause.

I desire, in response to the Senator from Delaware, who said that General Schenck, "who had been placed where he should be on account of his nefarious conduct"—that was the precise language used by the Senator, as I understood him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Illinois will allow me to say that the remarks I made about General Schenck I made before I knew the man was on a bed of sickness.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that. The Senator made them before he knew that the general was sick. That means if he had known that he was sick he would not have said what he did, but if he were well the Senator would still say what he did say. Now I desire on behalf General Schenck in this Chamber to say that no more honorable man lives. When treason stalked abroad in this land, when this mighty nation of ours was reeling and rocking to and fro like a distressed vessel upon the stormy seas, he came forward and with that strong arm of his he reached out that he might assist in steadying her as she rode the billows of treason. He was one of the band of patriots in this land who defied treason and faced the war made against the nation; willing to risk his life and his all for its preservation.

I do not claim that he is entitled to great credit for being a patriot. It was naught but that which was his duty. But the fact that he was a patriot is no reason why he should be maligned either here or elsewhere. What has he done that he for his "nefarious conduct" should receive the condemnation of the people of this country? What "nefarious conduct" has he been guilty of? He clutched the flag of his country in his hands when treason seized it in order that it might be trampled in the dust. Was that "nefarious conduct?" Sir, is it for that he is to be condemned?

Sir, I am free to say that the insinuations and the jeers that have been made in this Chamber from the other side toward men who fought for the Union have not come frequently from men who shed their own blood or were willing to do it, but from men who did not and were not willing to do it.

It is no mark of bravery that men sneer at others because they stood by their country. It is not the mark of gentility. It is no evidence of statesmanship. It is far from being proof of good breeding.

Now, sir, General Schenck is getting old; is with disease tottering on the road to the grave; he is to-day crippled, maimed, disabled; a pensioner on his Government on account of wounds that he received in its defense; he stands to-day before this land as a patriot; as an honest man; as a brave man; and at all times the peer of the Senator from Delaware; one whom he could not sneer at were he entitled to a seat on this floor, as is the Senator from Delaware. For that old patriot I have but this to say: the heart of the man that can allow him to touch the untarnished reputation of a brave man and a patriot would go out against those much more near and dear to him than the one he seeks to strike. This man, General Schenck, is a true man and a patriot. For him I pray that peace may be all along his pathway until the time shall come when he shall be summoned to

> The undiscovered country, from whose bourn
> No traveler returns.

Now, Mr. President, pardon me for another word, and I shall have done. In the discussion of this question a few days ago the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] alluded to military orders in his State during the year 1865. I allude to it now inasmuch as a discussion has been dragged in here in some way or other, I know not how, having reference to military orders—General Schenck's and other military commanders'. In the State of Kentucky, in the month of July, 1865, a military order was issued by the commanding general of that department, and for the purpose of having it appear by the side of the order of General Schenck I ask the Secretary to read it from the desk. I send to the desk the paper containing the order.

The Secretary read as follows:

[General Orders, No. 51.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF KENTUCKY,
Louisville, Kentucky, July 26, 1865.

The near approach of an important election, to be held in all the counties of the State and military department of Kentucky, renders it proper, in the judgment of the general commanding, to require all officers commanding troops to give to the officers of the State charged by law with the duty of conducting elections, and to the legal voters of the State, the most complete protection. Martial law prevails in the Department of Kentucky, and certain classes of persons are especially under military surveillance and control. These are:

1. All rebel soldiers, whether paroled or not, and without regard to the fact that they have or have not taken any of the oaths prescribed by law, or executive or military orders, or have registered under orders from the headquarters of the Department of Kentucky.

2. All guerrillas and others who, without belonging to regular rebel military organizations, have taken up arms against the Government, or have in any way operated against the government or people of Kentucky or any other State or Territory.

3. All persons who, by act or word, directly or indirectly, gave aid comfort, or encouragement to persons in rebellion. This applies to all persons who have voluntarily acted as scouts or spies for rebel or guerrilla forces; who have voluntarily furnished any rebel force or person with information, food, clothing, horses, arms, or money, or have harbored, concealed, or otherwise aided or encouraged them.

4. All deserters from the military or naval service of the United States who did not return to said service or report themselves to some provost-marshal within the sixty days limited in the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated the 11th day of March, 1865; and all persons who deserted from the military or naval service of the United States after the 3d day of March, 1865, and all persons duly enrolled who departed the jurisdiction of the district in which they were enrolled or went beyond the limits of the United States to avoid any draft.

All persons who were, or have been, directly or indirectly, engaged in the civil service of the late so-called confederate government or of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky, or who have in any way voluntarily submitted to either of said pretended governments—all agents of or contractors with or for such pretended governments—all such persons are disqualified from voting by the laws of the State of Kentucky, and the act of Congress of March 3, 1865.

All persons of the classes aforesaid are required to abstain from all interference with elections, and will, if they shall in any manner interfere therein, by voting or attempting to vote, or by persuading any other person to vote, or by appearing at the polls, be at once arrested and held for military trial.

Aid will be given to the civil authorities to enforce the laws and to preserve the peace. Any person who shall counsel, advise, or encourage any judge of any election, or any other person, to disregard or disobey the law as declared in the proclamation of the governor of the State, will be at once arrested.

The peace of the country can be secured only by obedience to the laws.

By command of Major-General John M. Palmer.

E. B. HARLAN,
Captain and Assistant Adjutant-General.

Official.

BEN. W. SULLIVAN,
Lieutenant and Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Secretary will turn over to the paper of August 1, I think it is, and notice the speech made by the same party marked—I wish he would read the paragraph that is marked and give the date.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is under date of "Lexington, Kentucky, August 1, 1865:"

It is the fashion to abuse the military, but I discover that the apprehension of military interference is expressed most frequently by a class of men with whom the Federal Army has been interfering for more than four years past. They are the very men who thought the Federal Government had no right and no power to coerce the rebels into submission. Many of them thought, a great many very good men thought that Kentucky in the beginning of this controversy could be perfectly neutral, could hold the balance between the contending parties; that Kentucky could keep the peace; that her sacred soil should not be invaded. That was the delusion of a great many good men, and there were a great many men who were, perhaps, equally good, although much worse mistaken, that thought the Federal Government could not as a matter of right or as a matter of power coerce the rebels into submission. The same class of men manifest the same fears of the Federal authorities now as they did then. Your newspapers were filled then with these groanings that could not be uttered, these terrible apprehensions of Federal interference. I should like to know of him who desired the perpetuation of this Government which party—if the Federal Government must be antagonized to other interests—which party is most likely to regard the interests of the people of Kentucky, the Federal Government, represented in Kentucky by soldiers from Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, and many of your own true sons of Kentucky—is the Federal Government more likely, I say, to invade the rights of the people of Kentucky than these men, whose voices have always been against the people of Kentucky? Which would you rather trust, a Federal regiment or a rebel mob? According to my way of thinking, I have still more confidence in the boys in blue jackets. [Applause.] But if the liberties of the people of Kentucky are to be subverted, my apprehensions do not lie in the direction of Union soldiers. I do not think the liberties of the people are in danger from either cause. In the first place, the representatives of the Federal Government have no desire to interfere, and, in the second place, these other men will not be allowed to do so, if they so desire it.

Mr. LOGAN. I have thus had read the order issued by General John M. Palmer, of the State of Illinois, when he was in command in the State of Kentucky, and a portion of a speech made on the date stated by the same person, General John M. Palmer. Now, I suppose some of my friends here may have a curiosity to know why I have had this order and this part of his speech read. I will state the reason. General John M. Palmer is a lawyer, a man of ability. He has been governor of my State, he was a major-general in the Union Army. He issued that order of his own motion in Kentucky, without being directed by the President or any one else, as I understand it, on what he considered the law. He made the speech that I have had read sustaining that order. Now, who is General John M. Palmer? He was one of the democratic visiting statesmen on behalf of Mr. Tilden to New Orleans. He is now at least trying to be a democratic candidate for President, and inasmuch as he and my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] will probably have a contest for the democratic nomination in the State of Illinois, I thought I would give my colleague the benefit of that speech and of that order.

Mr. BECK. Now I ask for a vote on the question of whether there shall be more clerks in the Post-Office Department, and I desire to say that I shall endeavor to confine the debate from this time on to the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.]

Mr. BECK. On that I have called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BUTLER. My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is detained from the Senate by sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 26; as follows:

Carpenter,	Hampton,	McPherson,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I move, in line 2209, on page 90, to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to read:

One Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, $5,000.

I send to the desk to be read a letter from the Attorney-General and also one from the Postmaster-General recommending this amendment. I will say that the bill as it stands reported by the committee provides that there shall be three Assistant Attorneys-General, at $5,000 each, and one Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, at $4,000. The amendment proposes to give $5,000 to this Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department instead of $4,000, as the bill reported by the committee proposes.

Mr. BECK. I raise the point of order on that amendment. The law provides $4,000 salary. This is an increase in violation of law. The law creating the office of Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department was the act of June 2, 1872, (Statutes, volume 17, page 284,) "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," by which the salary was fixed at $4,000, and it has remained unchanged to this date. The other Assistant Attorneys-General were provided for as follows: two by the act of June 22, 1870, (volume 16, page 163,) and one additional by the act of February 25, 1871, (volume 16, page 432,) and their salaries were fixed at $5,000, and have so remained ever since. Therefore we have complied with the law, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the point of order decided.

Mr. BECK. I simply mean to say I am satisfied the Committee on Appropriations have followed the law, and I will not see it changed unless by a deliberate expression of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands the rule, this amendment is clearly out of order. It is not an amendment moved by any of the standing committees, nor is it for the execution of any law or treaty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And then it is legislation; it changes a salary fixed by law.

Mr. BAILEY. The amendment is sustained by one of the Departments, indeed by two of the Departments of the Government, and I understand that it may be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was ruled some time ago, not by the present incumbent of the chair, but by the Vice-President, the Chair believes, that the estimates referred to in these rules are not a mere communication from a Secretary of one of the Departments to a member of the Senate or anybody else, but the regular Book of Estimates furnished to Congress in respect to the amounts necessary for carrying on the Government. That was the ruling made, and unless this is in one of those estimates it comes directly within the prohibition of Rule 27. That rule declares:

And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

In the opinion of the Chair this does not come within any of these categories, and is therefore out of order.

Mr. PLUMB. I now call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to an amendment which I proposed some days since to line 396, page 17, which I now offer. I move to strike out "executive" in line 396, and to add after the word "clerks" in the same line the words "in the General Land Office;" so as to read:

And the duties prescribed by section 450 of the Revised Statutes shall devolve upon, and be discharged by, one of the clerks in the General Land Office, to be designated by the President for that purpose.

Mr. BECK. On that I make the point of order. It is a change of the existing law.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that point is made I desire to state briefly that this is strongly recommended by the Interior Department. It has just this significance: Large numbers of entries by homestead and preemption and otherwise are being made of the public lands. The issuance of patents on these entries is behind from one to three years. By means of this simple amendment that work may be brought up very closely to the entries themselves without adding one single cent of expense. It is very strongly recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by the Secretary of the Interior, and is properly an administrative matter. It only changes the clerk upon whom shall be devolved this duty from the executive clerk in the mansion of the President to one of the clerks in the General Land Office.

Mr. BECK. The existing law, approved June 19, 1878, reads thus:

And the duties prescribed by section of the Revised Statutes numbered 450 shall devolve upon and be discharged by one of the executive clerks, to be designated by the President for that purpose.

That is the law now, and it is proposed to change that law by this amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will permit, I ask to have the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not affect the question of order.

Mr. HOAR. Is the point of order disposed of? If not, I object to debate upon it. I want to get along with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to have a reference to the law that is spoken of.

Mr. BECK. The law approved June 19, 1878, provides:

And the duties prescribed by section of the Revised Statutes numbered 450—

The one referred to—shall devolve upon and be discharged by one of the executive clerks, to be designated by the President for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, then, is nothing but a restatement of the law.

Mr. BECK. The bill is merely a restatement of the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is necessarily out of order. It proposes to change the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It falls clearly within that rule.

Mr. PLUMB. Then what is the object of retaining this provision in the bill?

Mr. BECK. The House placed it there, and we saw no objection to it. That is all I know of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is out of order.

Mr. PADDOCK. On page 81, line 1992, I move to strike out after "for" the word "monthly," and after the word "dollars," in the following line, to insert:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall issue a report each month, which shall contain general information and statistics concerning the crops, the condition of live-stock, and other matters of interest and importance to the agriculturists of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. What do you do with the other proviso?

Mr. PADDOCK. Leave it as it stands, simply inserting the word "and."

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the effect of this?

Mr. PADDOCK. The effect of this is to make more imperative the requirement for the issuing of monthly reports. Under this provision as it has stood always heretofore, the monthly reports have not been made regularly; latterly, during the past two or three years, they have rarely been made; and it is a matter of very great importance to the country that they should be made monthly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They cannot do it for $10,000.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think they can.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Is this from the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. PADDOCK. No, sir; it is not from any committee at all.

Mr. BECK. Then I make a point of order. I know nothing about it.

Mr. ALLISON. Has this the approval of the Commissioner of Agriculture?

Mr. PADDOCK. It has not. It has my approval.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is legislation.

Mr. TELLER. Has it the approval of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. PADDOCK. It has, I think. The former chairman, at any rate, approves it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not see that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska increases an appropriation or adds an additional item to it. If it changes any existing law, the Chair is not aware of it.

Mr. PADDOCK. The amendment does not increase the appropriation, nor is an increase of appropriation contemplated. It is believed to be entirely practicable to have these monthly reports with the appropriation as it is proposed to be made by the Committee on Appropriations. It is simply a change of the text of the bill so as to make this requirement for monthly reports more imperative. That is all there is of it. The monthly reports are even more important to the country than the annual reports, and if either is to be left out the annual report had better be left out and the monthly report remain.

Mr. BECK. We have in this bill repeated simply word for word the existing law.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is what I stated. That is what is the matter, that under this phraseology as it has heretofore been put into the appropriation bills the monthly report has not been made. It is because it is a matter of supreme importance that a monthly report should be made that I desire to emphasize in the text of the bill the requirement of the Commissioner that he shall so do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that there is a permanent law that is altered by this amendment of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PADDOCK. I think the Senator will hardly say that.

Mr. BECK. I am not sure whether there is or not. I send to the President the existing law. Whether that applies only to the current appropriation for the year I do not know, or whether it is a permanent law I do not know, because our attention was not called to it before.

Mr. PADDOCK. The existing law only calls for monthly reports.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the standing law in the statutes is merely an authority for the Commissioner to issue monthly reports when necessary, and this change makes it mandatory, then it is general legislation as much so as anything can be.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator having the bill in charge has the law, I shall be glad to have him read it or have it read.

Mr. BECK. I have sent it to the Chair.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not think there need be any sensitiveness about additional legislation on this bill.

Mr. BECK. One of the great difficulties I have is perhaps defective hearing. I am wholly unable to hear what the Senator from Nebraska says. I know he has been saying something, but I cannot hear it, and I do not know what changes he desires to make.

Mr. BURNSIDE. By a general understanding I think we were to go into executive session at four o'clock. Inasmuch as it will take some time to settle this question, and it can be settled as well on Monday as now, I move that we proceed to executive business.

Mr. BECK. I think we can get through shortly. We lost two hours to-day by a political discussion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think the understanding was very distinct with the Senator from Kentucky representing the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. It was. I agreed that at four o'clock I would not object to an executive session.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have an impression that I hold the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator will allow me to have an understanding that I shall have the floor on the pending bill for Monday.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will give way to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. I shall be glad to have that understanding, if it will not interfere with the convenience of other Senators.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hold the floor myself, but I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It seems to me that there are four people on the floor at the present time.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have not sat down since I started.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator from Rhode Island will consent to that, I have no objection to his motion for an executive session.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky, who said he did not understand the object of my amendment, that the object of it is to emphasize the requirement on the Commissioner of Agriculture to publish monthly reports.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has not withdrawn his motion, which is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment——

Mr. BURNSIDE. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Maine will be entitled to the floor on Monday upon the appropriation bill. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 21.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If I could possibly transfer my punishment to some Senators who voted against this motion, if I could transfer some of the importunities of men who are interested in the thing I desire to get before the Senate, if I could transfer some of the numerous letters I constantly receive, I should be vindictive enough to do so and put my annoyance on others.

Mr. WITHERS. I think in ten or fifteen minutes we can get through the bill, and then go into executive session and transact the business the Senator desires us to attend to.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I cannot speak publicly what the thing is, but all Senators know to what I refer. I have been trying for a long time to get it before the Senate, and the annoyance to me is very great indeed. There are three or four hundred people interested in it, and I am not only personally importuned but I am importuned by letters in every mail that comes to me. I desire to have the thing acted on one way or the other. I shall not complain if my view of the matter is not taken. However, I yield for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question submitted to the Chair is whether the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] is in order. Upon looking into the law (which has required some little time) it seems that under the existing law whether the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make monthly reports is discretionary; he may or may not make them monthly. The amendment proposes to render it imperative that he shall make them monthly, and is therefore a change of existing law. The amendment is therefore out of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest this little point should be overlooked in hurrying on with the bill, I wish to move to strike out from line 2108 to 2168 inclusive, if there is not any other amendment that any one wants to propose just now.

Mr. ALLISON. That will likely give rise to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, can we not go into executive session? If there is no other amendment to be proposed, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. There are some other amendments which have been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations. Whether they are to be presented to the Senate I do not know. If there are no other amendments to be proposed here, I consent now to an executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair has entertained my motion. I should like to have the question stated on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to state it when the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] rose.

Mr. PLUMB. There is an amendment I offered yesterday which I desire to present to the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Vermont withhold his amendment until this is acted on?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have my amendment pending because it is so small a matter that it may be forgotten; but it may be laid aside informally to take up any other little matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will hear the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, on page 70, line 1705, after the words "seventy-six," to insert:

Provided, That the claims for arrears of pensions shall be settled and determined as rapidly as possible; and as fast as determined, and as often as once in thirty days, the Secretary of the Interior shall make requisition upon the Secretary of the Treasury for funds necessary to pay all claims then settled; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to promptly meet such requisitions by placing to the credit of the Commissioner of Pensions the amount of the same out of any money which may be in the Treasury not necessary to meet payments of interest on the public debt.

Mr. BECK. I make the point of order on that. It changes the existing law, and we have done everything on that subject we can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Kentucky state what law will be changed by this amendment?

Mr. BECK. I had before me just now the act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions. I have not got it here at this moment, but I can state the substance. That act appropriates $25,000,000 for that purpose. There is no order given to the Secretary to pay in any given time any particular amount of money. We have released by an amendment already adopted, I think, some eight and a half millions to be added to that. But this amendment is not recommended by any estimate from the head of any Department, nor does it come from any committee. It orders the Secretary to pay certain sums at certain times, if I caught it correctly.

Mr. TELLER. Only so fast as the claims are allowed.

Mr. PLUMB. This amendment grew to some extent by the discussion had in this Chamber a couple of days since on the ten-million clause. At the last session of Congress, when the question of paying these arrears of pensions was under consideration, the Secretary of the Treasury was understood to say that the appropriation would produce a deficiency in the general revenue; and on the occasion of the debate a day or two ago on the question as to whether the money held in the Treasury for the purpose of redeeming fractional currency should be devoted to paying these arrears of pensions, it was stated here as by authority that there was no necessity for appropriating that money for the reason that there was abundance of money in the Treasury without it.

I confess that between these two statements, so directly opposed to each other, I became a little confused. It was further stated as coming from the Secretary of the Treasury, and stated I believe by the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK,] that $2,000,000 a month was as much as would be required to meet these claims. It has been given out in one way and another through the public press in such manner as to affect the belief of the class of persons entitled to arrears of pensions that they are to be paid only so fast as the Treasury receives money which it does not need for other purposes.

Now, in order to satisfy myself on this point, I have made some inquiry, and I feel warranted in saying that not only is $2,000,000 a month much less than the amount of money that will be required to pay the arrears of pensions, but that the amount needed will be more than twice that sum; and in fact I think that it will be more than three times that sum, provided the force of the Pension Office applicable to that purpose is kept constantly at work, as it should be upon this class of claims.

As I said, the impression has gone out from something that was said or alleged to have been said by the Secretary of the Treasury, that these claims were only to be paid when he got the money, that is to say when he got money that he did not need for other purposes. I do not impute this opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury. I only speak of the existence of the belief that he has said it, and the effect of that belief is manifested in one way at any rate, by the letters that I receive from that class of persons anticipating great delay by reason of these alleged utterances on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not know anything about the purpose of that official or of any other official of this Government. I would not venture to state where I got my authority for fear we should have another debate on the constitutional question of how information should get into this Chamber. But, as I said before, I feel perfectly sure that at least $6,000,000 a month of these claims will be adjusted if the money is provided promptly to pay them; and I desire further to say that if there is any class of people entitled to receive money from the Treasury of the United States it is this same class of people who are entitled to the arrears of pensions. Whatever controversy might have existed as to whether these people should be paid, whatever the opinion of any Senator may be as to the propriety or impropriety of that act, certainly there can be none now as to the propriety of giving what we do give without grudging, giving it freely, paying it as a debt that is due, to be paid as fast as the amounts can be ascertained.

I was going on to say in reference to the point of order that has been made, that for the purpose of expressing what I believe to be the fair intent of the law itself, to wit, that these claims should be adjusted as fast as possible and paid as fast as adjusted, I propose here to say that, whatever other demands there may be upon the public Treasury, except interest upon the public debt, these men shall first be paid. If there is any class of public creditors, high or low, rich or poor, who are entitled to preference, it is these men who have this amount now due them by reason of the action of the last Congress, and I propose to prefer them as creditors. I do not say that any purpose exists not to prefer them; but I do say that such an impression prevails among them and it is producing great discontent; and I believe, too, that under the operation of this provision which I seek to incorporate in this bill that money will all be disbursed prior to the 1st day of next December; and I very much fear that except under the operation of some such provision much of that which is due to these people will not be paid for a year or more.

Mr. BECK. The existing law I hold in my hand, and I send it to the Chair marked. This is clearly a change in it, in my opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered certainly has the effect to change the law approved March 3, 1879; at least to add to that law; it does not alter what is in the law, but it makes additional provisions which have the effect to change the law from what it now is. The Chair is inclined to think that the amendment is out of order, but prefers to submit the question to the Senate for another reason, because there is a question whether or not this amendment directly relates to the item of the bill to which it is offered as an amendment, and, under the twenty-ninth rule, whenever a question of relevancy is made, it must be submitted to the Senate; and both these questions can be decided at once by the Senate. It is not for the Chair to decide the question of relevancy; the rule is imperative that it shall be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, I ask by common consent that this question go over till Monday to be decided then in the morning hour, and that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall be glad to have the point of order decided now. If the point of order is decided against the amendment, it ends it of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated that inasmuch as the question whether this amendment is in order involves the question whether it is relevant, and the rule is imperative that that question must be submitted to the Senate, the Chair thinks it is proper to submit the whole question to the Senate, both whether it is new legislation and also whether it is relevant. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator from Kentucky will now let us go into executive session. I think we can decide this point of order more intelligently after a little further examination as to the necessity of the case, because if his intimation be true that further provision is necessary to be made I think there will be no objection, even though a point of order might strictly apply.

Mr. BECK. On that suggestion I will assent, as far as I am concerned, to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BRUCE. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BRUCE. I offer an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill which I think will meet and remedy evils which have been complained of by a number of Senators within the last few days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 178) to provide for the change of name of the steamboat Alexis; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 141) to remove the political disabilities of John S. Saunders, of Baltimore, Maryland; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 178) to provide for the change of name of the steamboat Alexis was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 17, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PAY OF EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee of Claims:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to pay the messengers who were discharged from the soldiers' roll of the House of Representatives after the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress two months' pay each.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MYERS also submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to D. L. Payne $400 for extra services as a messenger of the House of Representatives during and since the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress.

CHANGE OF VOTE.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to change my vote upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to the coinage bill, from "no" to "ay."

The SPEAKER. The RECORD is correct.

Mr. KING. Yes, the RECORD is correct, and I ask unanimous consent to change my vote.

Mr. BREWER. I object.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's object has been reached. The morning hour begins at eighteen minutes past twelve, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which is the report from the Committee on the Revision of the laws of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with amendments. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] is entitled to the floor, and has twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. MCLANE. I had finished everything I had to say in reference to this bill day before yesterday, therefore I shall only detain the House while I reply to the inquiry made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

The objection I took to the first clause of section 639 had reference to the judicial construction of this first clause rather than to that clause itself. I have no objection at all to the clause, and shall be content with the amendment, which instead of striking out the first clause of the section only provides that where a foreign corporation is doing business in a State under the laws of that State it shall be subject to be sued in the courts of the State. Inasmuch as it is entirely within the power of Congress in these cases to transfer them or not, it is entirely discretionary with Congress whether it will give to inferior tribunals all the jurisdiction secured to United States courts as original jurisdiction. I would not give to these courts entire power; I would leave it where the Constitution leaves it. Only when the jurisdiction is original should such suits be brought in United States courts, and where the jurisdiction is not original, where it results from the power granted by Congress to transfer a case, then I would only give the power to transfer in the cases I have named, and I would thus remedy a great evil, which I believe results from the judicial construction of the first clause of section 639 of the Revised Statutes.

Section 639 itself, so far as the first clause of it is concerned, I understand to be precisely as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] states, a portion of the law of 1789. It was not to that clause that I intended to take any exception, but it was to the construction placed upon it. I dwelt upon the construction placed upon it and the evils which had resulted from it.

I believe the clause contained in the bill reported by the committee is perfectly satisfactory, in so far as it refers to section 639, and I believe that all three of these clauses ought to be repealed, or else so modified as to make it impossible for these cases, especially those of the insurance companies, which are under the control of the State laws and are only admitted into a State when controlled by the State laws. I venture to say that no State would permit them to do business within its limits if they were not subject to the laws of the State.

I do not myself seek to place any restriction on the companies more than is proper and reasonable. But, sir, I did not mean to consume as much time as I find that I am doing.

But for the interruption of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] I would in five minutes have disposed of the inquiry addressed to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and would have then made to him the acknowledgment which I make to-day. I understand perfectly that this first clause of section 639 is in substance the twelfth section of the original judiciary act. We do repeal it by this bill, and I contend that we ought to repeal it, unless we can modify it so as to render the present judicial construction of it impossible.

But what interests me more in this bill, I say frankly to the House, is the repeal of section 643 of the Revised Statutes. It is to that section I desire to call the attention of the House before I close what I have to say upon this bill. An officer of the United States in the execution of a Federal law by the original judiciary act has a perfect and complete remedy. I need not say to this House that whenever a Federal officer is interfered with in the discharge of his duty, and is arrested and sued criminally or civilly in a State court, he has only to plead that a Federal statute or the Constitution is in question The moment he files that plea, if the court rules against him, he has a right to go to the Supreme Court of the United States to have it decided whether a Federal statute or the Constitution is in question, and if it is decided that it is in question, then the State court has no longer control over the matter. The remedy is perfect and complete under the original judiciary act and the acts of February 5, 1867, and February 18, 1875, codified in sections 709 and 710 of the Revised Statutes.

There never was the slightest necessity in truth for this section 643 of the Revised Statutes. Yet under that section a Federal officer who violates a State law or who violates the common law and is arrested and arraigned and indicted by a grand jury under the direction of a State court can now remove his case from the State court and go with his common-law or State-statute indictment, found by a State grand jury, and demand a trial upon that very indictment for an offense at the common law or under the State statute in the Federal court. A more unconstitutional proceeding, one more flagrant, bald, naked, has never been known in the history of this country. There is not a word to be said in its defense.

Mr. HOUSE. And the district attorney of the Federal court is instructed by the Attorney-General of the United States to defend all Federal officials indicted in a State court for a violation of State laws while engaged in the performance of Federal duties.

Mr. McLANE. So far as the right of a State is concerned in the defense of its own law, the case will perhaps be heard before a judge who never resided in that State, or might be heard before a judge who lives in the very extreme end of the Union. This renders it to me as offensive in its form as in its substance. It degrades the State institutions; it degrades the people of a State.

Is there any man on this floor on either side who is willing to-day that the State law—it is not now a question of a State citizen, but a question whether the State law—the State sovereignty, whether that sovereignty be much or little, whatever it may be, shall be trampled upon and superseded? The constitutional right of a State to enforce its own laws is by the operation of the law now proposed to be repealed utterly ignored and disregarded.

Let us, gentlemen on either side of this House, meet upon this question; and when it is defined, when we do understand what is the power and jurisdiction of a State, no matter what it may be, let it be respected and permitted to be exercised. Although the original judiciary act provided an ample remedy, although any Federal officer has in the Supreme Court a tribunal always ready to protect him, yet under this section he is taken from the judicial authority of the State, from the State court, from the sheriff, and carried into a Federal court with our own State indictment to be tried by a Federal jury, not a jury of the neighborhood, but of the whole State.

Mr. FIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. Certainly.

Mr. FIELD. Suppose the defense in a State court is that the accused was acting under the authority of a law of the United States: is there any general provision whereby that question or any question of law arising out of it can be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States, except there be a division of opinion in the two judges sitting in the circuit court, after a removal of the case?

Mr. McLANE. Certainly.

Mr. FIELD. What?

Mr. McLANE. By the judiciary act of 1789 and the acts of 1867 and 1875 as codified in section 709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. FIELD. That relates to civil causes, not criminal causes.

Mr. McLANE. The judiciary act of 1789, the acts of February 5, 1867, and February 18, 1875, which are codified in section 709 of the Revised Statutes, refer to criminal as well as civil suits.

Mr. FIELD. Precisely; that is the right of removal.

Mr. McLANE. I say to the honorable gentleman that all a marshal of the United States or a deputy marshal of the United States has to do under these three laws to which I have called his attention is to set forth in a proper plea the authority under which he acted, alleging that he acted under the authority of a United States law; and when he makes that plea the court to which he makes it, if it rules against his plea, will remove his cause to the Supreme Court of the United States to have that question passed upon.

Mr. FIELD. Under what law?

Mr. ATHERTON. Under the law I have referred to, to remove cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. FIELD. That relates to civil suits.

Mr. ATHERTON. No; to all kinds of suits.

Mr. FIELD. In a case where it is ruled against an officer?

Mr. ATHERTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McLANE. There is no doubt about it. And section 710 gives criminal suits precedence of civil suits. I shall not go on further with this question. I meant merely to call attention to the universal practice in this country, to the fact that from the foundation of the Government whenever a Federal officer has been interfered with and arrested and confined or restrained by the judicial authorities of a State, in civil as well as in criminal cases, if he makes that plea and it is ruled against him by the State court, then, being ruled against him, he has his right to transfer it to the Supreme Court of the United States; and that remedy has been sufficient until very recently.

I further appeal to the House to look at the recent legislation which, even if there were not in existence other remedies, is in itself a monstrous remedy—unconstitutional, I have no doubt. The decisions of the Supreme Court in regard to kindred acts clearly imply the unconstitutionality of this section to which I now refer; and I think this House ought to be delighted that it has an opportunity to pass on this question. This is why I have interested myself in this bill. I would have waited with pleasure and confidence for the action of the Judiciary Committee on the subject; there is no committee of this House upon which I would have waited with greater confidence. But the bill is now before us, and properly before us. The House has received it and entered upon its consideration. Whatever objection could have been rightfully taken in reference to the jurisdiction of the committee reporting it was not taken at the proper time, and no bill can possibly be before this House more legitimately than this bill is to-day. We ought not to lose the opportunity to pass upon it. If any exception can properly be taken to it, let it be amended. To-day, and if need be another day, will be amply sufficient for the presentation of all questions connected with it.

I for one am quite willing to vote for the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. URNER,] which strikes out the whole of the first section. That section refers to two clauses in the Constitution which I do not believe carry with them any great accumulation of business. The insurance cases once out of the way—and the business arising in that way will not, I believe, be open to the objection which I have taken in regard to this large class of insurance cases—I would vote also for any other amendment that did not touch the vital character of the bill.

But I urge that the House should avail itself of the present opportunity to get rid of features in the law which no man now defends, which no man now desires shall be retained upon the statute-book, whatever may have been the original motive or necessity for their adoption. As I said on the day before yesterday, these laws were passed at a time when many believed there was necessity for this extraordinary legislation. Most of them, the most obnoxious of them, were passed by overwhelming majorities, some of them when only one section of the country was represented in these halls. At all events they were passed amid the clamor and excitement attending the enactment of the reconstruction acts, the civil-rights bill, and the enforcement act; when men were casting about to see how widely the net could be stretched, how completely everything could be drawn into the control of Federal power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe we have passed beyond the time for any such legislation. There is no such necessity pressing upon us. And I would say this if I was speaking from the stand-point of a man who once believed that there was such necessity.

I see before me my honorable friend from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] to whose speech on the Army appropriation bill and also on the legislative appropriation bill I listened with very great pleasure; yet at the same time his argument admonished me how fully alive, how active, how vigorous the disposition to magnify the power of the Federal Government still is in this country. Surely arguments of that kind coming from him were not calculated to excite my surprise; for no man more than he has had experience in developing these principles in the administration of the Government. Having held the helm, having been so long either at the foot-stool of power or holding the power itself in his hands, I am not surprised that he should have an earnest desire to maintain the power of the Federal Government in full latitude and without restraint. When I heard him say that a Federal law was to be executed by the President of the United States without any stipulation, definition, or restriction upon his discretion in executing it; when I heard him refer to the administration of that immortal man, Andrew Jackson, as giving authority and sanction to the high Federal doctrine which the gentleman himself promulgated, I looked at him in wonder and surprise, because in my youth I studied the school of politics of Andrew Jackson and I have adhered to it from that day to this. I remember well that when Andrew Jackson was called on to deal with an insurrection, threatened or in fact existing, he communicated to Congress that his obligation was to see the processes of the law executed, and he asked Congress to give him new powers and new processes, and he never claimed or sought to have conferred on him any other power than to enforce the judicial processes necessary to the execution of the laws of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland on the left, [Mr. URNER,] a member of the committee reporting the bill.

Mr. McLANE. I allowed my time to expire inadvertently. I was under an obligation to the committee to move the previous question, and I now make that motion. If the previous question be seconded there will still remain one hour for debate.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. URNER] desire?

Mr. URNER. I do not know. I shall be as brief as possible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was advised that the gentleman from Maryland, a member of the committee, was next to speak.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The understanding was that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] should call the previous question, and if that was sustained, the advocates of the bill having occupied two hours and the opponents one hour, the whole of the remaining hour after the sustaining of the previous question was to be given to gentlemen on the other side, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. URNER] being allowed to divide the hour with his friends as he might think proper.

Mr. URNER. I claim the hour to which I am entitled by the recognition of the Chair. I desire to say something on this bill because I have offered an amendment to it——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I insist that a vote be taken on the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot insist on what did not occur.

Mr. URNER. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this is one of the most important questions that has been brought to the attention of this House at this session of Congress. The amendment I have proposed strikes out the whole of the first section; and I desire to call the attention of members to that very important provision of this bill. It will be seen the first section repeals entirely sections 639 and 647 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the removal of causes from State courts into the circuit court of the United States. I will read an extract from section 2, article 3 of the Constitution:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens or subjects.

I hold under this provision of the Constitution it is the right of any citizen of any State, in any suit or controversy between him and the citizen of another State, to have a United States court pass upon the question in controversy.

Now, sir, it is very well known that the Constitution does not execute itself, but that it requires action on the part of Congress, and, therefore, congressional legislation was required to make that right contemplated by the Constitution effective and valuable to the citizen. When the first Congress met under the Constitution in 1789 one of its very first acts was to pass the act of 1789, section 12, which I will read, as that is the law which it is proposed to repeal by the bill now before the House when it provides for the repeal of section 639 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That if a suit be commenced in any State court against an alien, or by a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought against a citizen of another State, and the matter in dispute exceeds the aforesaid sum or value of $500, exclusive of costs, to be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court; and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in such State court, file a petition for the removal of the cause for trial into the next circuit court, to be held in the district where the suit is pending, or if in the district of Maine to the district court next to be holden therein, or if in Kentucky district to the district court next to be holden therein, and offer good and sufficient surety for his entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of the said process against him, and also for his there appearing and entering special bail in the cause, if special bail was originally requisite therein, it shall then be the duty of the State court to accept the surety, and proceed no further in the cause, and any bail that may have been originally taken shall be discharged, and said copies being entered as aforesaid, in such court of the United States, the cause shall there proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process.

That has been the law of this country from 1789 down to the present time. It is true its provisions have been enlarged; it is true it is made to apply to certain causes to which it did not apply originally; but the law-makers of this country, not only in the original act but in the amendments thereto, have had in view all the time the provision of the Constitution which I have read giving the right to citizens of different States to go into the Federal courts for protection and adjudication of their suits.

As my time is limited I must, Mr. Speaker, be as brief as possible, and I will now call attention of the House to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the very subject here involved. While perhaps it is not an authority before Congress, nevertheless it presents this question and the right and the reason of the law in so much more forcible a manner than I can present it, I am sure I will not be doing my cause injustice by reading from it. It is directly in the line of what I stated a moment ago, that the Constitution does not execute itself, but that legislation is required for that purpose. I read from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, Martin vs. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 326 et seq.:

The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people, in framing this great charter of our liberties, to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution. It was foreseen that this would be a perilous and difficult, if not an impracticable, task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter; and restrictions and specifications, which at the present might seem salutary, might in the end prove the overthrow of the system itself. Hence, its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving to the Legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mold and model the exercise of its powers as its own wisdom and the public interests should require.

Further on the decision continues:

Let this article be carefully weighed and considered. The language of the article throughout is manifestly designed to be mandatory upon the Legislature. Its obligatory force is so imperative that Congress could not, without a violation of its duty, have refused to carry it into operation.

* * * * * * * *

If, then, it is a duty of Congress to vest the judicial power of the United States, it is a duty to vest the whole judicial power. The language, if imperative as to one part, is imperative as to all. If it were otherwise, this anomaly would exist, that Congress might successively refuse to vest the jurisdiction in any one class of cases enumerated in the Constitution, and thereby defeat the jurisdiction as to all; for the Constitution has not singled out any class on which Congress are bound to act in preference to others.

And further on I read:

This construction will be fortified by an attentive examination of the second section of the third article. The words are, "the judicial power shall extend," &c. Much minute and elaborate criticism has been employed upon these words. It has been argued that they are equivalent to the words "may extend," and that "extend" means to widen to new cases not before within the scope of the power. For the reasons which have been already stated, we are of opinion that the words are used in an imperative sense. They import an absolute grant of judicial power. They cannot have a relative signification applicable to powers already granted; for the American people had not made any previous grant.

This opinion was delivered by Justice Story. Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is true as contended for by Justice Story in this case, that it is mandatory upon the Legislature of the country to pass such laws as will make these provisions of the Constitution effective and valuable to the citizens, then I say we have no right, having in view a just regard to our duty as legislators, to repeal that act of 1789 and the other acts that have only extended the power but which have kept in view all the time the provision of the Constitution. I will refer briefly to what Mr. Hamilton has said upon this question in the Federalist:

The power of determining causes between two States, between one State and the citizens of another, and between the citizens of different States, is perhaps not less essential to the peace of the Union than that which has been just examined. History gives us a horrid picture of the dissensions and private wars which distracted and desolated Germany prior to the institution of the imperial chamber by Maximilian toward the close of the fifteenth century, and informs us at the same time of the vast influence of that institution in appeasing the disorders and establishing the tranquillity of the empire. This was a court invested with authority to decide finally all differences among the members of the Germanic body.

* * * * * * *

Whatever practices may have a tendency to disturb the harmony of the States are proper objects of Federal superintendence and control.

It may be esteemed the basis of the Union that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." And if it be a just principle that every government ought to possess the means of executing its own provisions by its own authority it will follow that in order to the inviolable maintenance of that equality of privileges and immunities to which the citizens of the Union will be entitled the national judiciary ought to preside in all cases in which one State or its citizens are opposed to another State or its citizens.

And further on Mr. Hamilton says:

The reasonableness of the agency of the national courts in cases in which the State tribunals cannot be supposed to be impartial speaks for itself. No man ought certainly to be a judge in his own cause, or in any cause, in respect to which he has the least interest or bias. This principle has no inconsiderable weight in designating the Federal courts as the proper tribunals for the determination of controversies between different States and their citizens.

Now, it has been argued here that a continuation of this law will allow insurance companies, when they have been sued—because corporations have been held to be citizens in the contemplation of this law—when they are sued in States in which they have not a legal residence, if they can claim that their legal residence is in another State, to exercise the right of removing their cases to the United States court, and thus subject the plaintiff suitor to very great inconvenience and expense. I know, Mr. Speaker, that there is great hardship to private individuals in many cases by the exercise of this power; but, sir, that does not affect the underlying principle that is involved in this controversy. The right should exist. If the right is abused that is no argument against the principle that is involved. And I am not without authority upon that point. Judge Story in this decision says:

It is always a doubtful course to argue against the use or the existence of a power from the possibility of its abuse.

And Mr. Hamilton in the Federalist refers to the same thing:

The possibility of particular mischiefs can never be viewed by a well-informed mind as a solid objection to a principle which is calculated to avoid general mischiefs and to obtain general advantages.

Now, sir, it seems to me that the reasonableness of this thing would strike all our minds at once. We all know the effect of local prejudice. Ah, but they say this law has been stretched to such an extent that this right of removal is extended to the plaintiff as well as to the defendant. We are told that a plaintiff can bring his suit in a State court, and after he becomes satisfied he cannot get justice there he can file his petition and support it by affidavit and have the suit removed to the United States court. Well, at first blush it does seem a little hard that after a man has selected a forum in which he wants his case disposed of, he can afterward turn his back upon it and seek another. But, then, a case may occur in which a party may become satisfied, after he has instituted his suit in a court, that he cannot get justice by reason of local prejudice in that court. But even suppose we take away this right of removal of suit and repeal this law, the suit can still be brought in the United States court, as the plaintiff can non pros. his suit in the State court without prejudice and institute a new suit in the United States court. So that I see no valuable remedy to be obtained by the repeal of this law.

But they tell us that in the State of Ohio they have a very peculiar law; that a party can bring suit and have his case tried, and if not satisfied with the result he can give a bond and then have his case tried over again; and because the one trial is not a final determination he has the right under this law to go into the United States court. It seems to me that that is a most anomalous state of affairs which they have in Ohio. But I do not think we, legislating for this whole country, should repeal a just law having embodied in it sound principles in order to accommodate the eccentricities of an Ohio statute. The argument that has been used here had better be addressed to the Legislature of Ohio to induce them to repeal or modify their eccentric law.

So much now for my amendment, which is in favor of retaining these provisions of the Revised Statutes intact.

Mr. FRYE. If it will not interrupt the line of the gentleman's argument, I desire to call his attention to this fact: under the law the plaintiff may elect his forum; he may go into a United States court or into a State court, and this Congress cannot take away from him that power, because the Constitution guarantees it to him, at least it allows him to go into a United States court at any rate. Now, under the existing law the defendant being a resident of another State may transfer the cause within a certain time to a United States court. But if this bill becomes a law the right remains in the plaintiff to elect his forum and it takes from the defendant the right the Constitution gives him.

Mr. URNER. That was certainly the object in the contemplation of the framers of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. But if you repeal section 639, which gives the right to the defendant to transfer his action to the United States court, he being a resident of another State from that in which the plaintiff resides, where in the statute do you find any other right?

Mr. URNER. Nowhere but in section 639.

Mr. FRYE. Now the bill under consideration repeals section 639, and if that is repealed it leaves the defendant in this condition: that in no way can he get into the United States courts if the plaintiff selects a State court.

Mr. URNER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] for the suggestion. That is a very strong argument why the bill should not become a law, because the argument for the bill is directed with great force to this provision which allows the plaintiff to remove his cause. Now attention is called to the fact that it does not deprive the plaintiff of the right of removal, but only takes it away from the defendant.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will my friend yield to me?

Mr. URNER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman has stated that the object of his amendment is to preserve the law as it was enacted in 1789.

Mr. URNER. And as enlarged by subsequent laws.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. In 1866 a law was passed by which permission was given to divide a cause so that one-half could be tried in the State courts and the other in the Federal courts. It also retains the law of 1867 which allowed the right of removal before the final judgment; further it retains the law which was enacted in 1875 wherein it was provided that if one hundred plaintiffs were engaged in a suit and one of them was a non-resident of the State he might remove the whole case into the Federal courts. The gentleman's amendment retains the acts of 1866, 1867, and 1875, as well as the law of 1789.

Mr. URNER. My amendment, if adopted, will allow the law to stand as it is now.

As I was about to remark before I was interrupted, I do not see why this law should not be enforced in regard to the right of any defendant to remove the cause. The right of one defendant is just as precious to him as the right of any other party to the suit. The law only authorizes the removal of parts of a cause when it can be heard against one defendant without affecting the rights of any other party, and a complete and whole case could be made out against him. Now, we ought to have this right to remove the cause into the United States courts.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My friend from Maine seemed to be in favor of the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. To save the gentleman trouble I will say that I do not know what the gentleman's amendment was, nor do I know what it is now; but I am not in favor of your bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. URNER. I must decline to yield.

I was about to say that it seems to be eminently proper in principle that we should give this right to go into the United States courts. The citizen of any particular State can look very appropriately to the courts of his own State for protection. It is the duty of the Government of every State to protect the rights of all its citizens. But when a suit is brought in a court of a State where the plaintiff is a resident against a citizen of another State there may be causes for prejudice so that the defendant cannot get justice there. He has no right to transfer his cause to the State courts of another State; but both parties have the right to look to the common parent, the General Government, that throws its protecting ægis over all the citizens of the whole country, for the protection of the rights of all parties to the suit, and there confidently expect justice to be dispensed with an impartial hand.

The Constitution has presumed, says Judge Story, whether rightly or not, that State attachments, State jealousies, and State interests might sometimes obstruct or control, or be supposed to obstruct or controvert, the regular administration of justice.

Hence in controversies between States, between citizens of different States, or between citizens and foreigners, it enables the parties, under the authority of the Constitution, to have the controversy heard and determined before the national tribunals.

Now, I want to say a word in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.] I stand rather alone in the committee, I think, upon my own amendment. But the minority of the committee stand together in indorsing the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana.

It is sought by this bill, in the amendment proposed to be made to sections 641 and 643 of the Revised Statutes, to take away the right of removal of criminal prosecutions that may be instituted in a State against persons acting under authority of the General Government. For instance, in all cases in which a revenue officer, acting under color of his office, acting under the authority of a United States law, shall commit what is considered an offense against a State law, it is proposed to amend the statute so that when he is indicted in the courts of a State he shall not have the right to go to the General Government that has given him his commission and sent him out to discharge duties for that General Government, and has told him——

Mr. MCMILLAN. With the gentleman's permission I wish to correct him.

Mr. URNER. I do not yield for that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I wish to ask the gentleman a question which will correct him. Do not sections 1026 and 709 of the Revised Statutes, which are left intact, refute the statement that you make that we propose to deprive such officers of the right to a trial in the Federal court? If you will read the sections you will see that it is so—sections 709 and 1026.

Mr. URNER. I have not time to take up that law now.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I recommend the gentleman to take it into private consideration.

Mr. URNER. I know this: that when this matter was under consideration in the committee, in reference to sections 641 and 643, which allow civil suits and criminal suits to be removed to the United States courts from State courts, this bill was agreed to by the majority of the committee, the purpose of which was to so amend the law as to take away the right of removal of criminal causes from State courts to the United States courts. The sections referred to by gentlemen on the other side provide only for an appeal after a final judgment in the case. They do not provide that when the suit is instituted, or the prosecution begun in the State court, and before any final judgment, an officer who has been indicted shall have the right to go into the United States court for protection at the hands of the Government that sent him out to do its bidding. I say it is right that he should have that remedy; I say it would deprive the Government of the United States in certain cases of the power to execute its law if these sections of the statutes are repealed or amended as is proposed.

This is no new law; this is no war measure to be "wiped out" from the statute-book. This principle of law, applicable to criminal cases, was first inaugurated in 1815, and again in 1833 at the time of the passage of the nullification law under General Jackson's administration, when it was not safe for an officer of the United States Government, a revenue officer, to go into certain portions of this Union to discharge the duty that his Government had committed to him.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the act of 1815?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. URNER. I prefer not to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not think the gentleman will decline to yield to a member of the committee.

Mr. URNER. I would rather not yield now.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Just one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says he prefers not to yield.

Mr. URNER. Very well; I will yield to the chairman of the committee for a moment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I want to read the proviso of the act of 1815. The first part of the section is almost verbatim the present law. That act provides that in any suit or prosecution removal shall take place. Then comes this proviso:

Provided nevertheless, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any prosecution for an offense involving corporal punishment.

So that under the law of 1815 you could not remove what is called a criminal cause, involving corporal punishment; that is, imprisonment in the penitentiary, or, in the case of murder, capital punishment.

Mr. URNER. The gentleman has read from the law of 1815, I understand. The law of 1833 has the same provision to which I have referred, and without any qualification. But even suppose this were a new law, I claim it is just and right and should be defended upon principle. I claim that when this Government sends a man out under its law to do its bidding, to execute the duties that are enjoined upon him by a law of his Government, he should feel that he has behind him the protection of his great Government, saying to him, "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of this broad land of ours, if your duty shall carry you there." [Applause on the republican side.]

I say that it would be unjust to an officer to send him out at the peril of his life in the discharge of delicate and responsible governmental duties and not give him full protection as long as he discharges those duties with fidelity and care. If, acting in the line of his duty and under color of his office, a civil suit should be brought against him; if he should be charged with infringing upon some private right; if in levying on property he has taken some he ought not to seize, and is charged with a trespass, and a civil suit is brought against him in which he may be subjected to a small amount of damages, in that case the majority of the committee say that he may have the right to remove his cause to the United States courts; but they proceed to say that if in the execution of the law of his Government he may be charged with having gone beyond a mere civil trespass, may be charged with an assault and battery, or with any crime against a State law, then, although he may have committed it in the execution of his duty as an officer of the United States Government, and in the prosecution therefor he may suffer not only pecuniary damage but loss of liberty and perchance loss of life, in that case the Government of the United States shall stand back and leave him to take care of himself in the community in which the alleged wrong may have been committed.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it would be a great wrong if the Government of the United States did not thus protect its own officers; and without such protection it could not get trusty officers to execute the national law. I am astonished that my colleague [Mr. MCLANE] should be opposed to this principle. It is a principle that has been adopted by the party with which he acts in the State of Maryland and of which he is deservedly so distinguished a member. To show that this principle has been adopted by his party in our own State, I will read from an act passed by the Legislature of Maryland in 1874 to be found in chapter 61 of the laws of Maryland for that year:

Whereas it is represented to the General Assembly that indictments or presentments have been or will be found in the United States court for the district of Maryland against sundry persons who served as officers of registration and as judges of election for acts done in the performance of duties imposed by the constitution and laws of this State in alleged violation of the act of Congress entitled "An act to enforce the rights of the citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes," which act is supposed to be in violation of the rights of the States in regulating elections held under their constitution and laws; and whereas it is the duty of the States to protect their citizens in the performance of duties imposed by State authority: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to instruct the attorney-general to enter his appearance and defend the said presentments; and he is also hereby authorized, in his discretion, to employ additional counsel to assist the attorney-general in defending said prosecutions; and the counsel so to be employed shall be paid hereafter for his services such sum as the Legislature may deem sufficient for his compensation.

Thus the party with which my colleague acts in the State of Maryland has declared that it is the duty of the State government to stand by its officers and defend them in the exercise of their official functions. It appropriates $10,000 to pay the expense of defending the officers of registration and judges of election, and imposes on the attorney-general and his assistants the duty of conducting such defense. However fraudulent perchance may have been the action of those registration and election officers, that is a question which under the law is to be determined when the case is tried; and it is made the duty of the law officers of the State to go into the United States court and defend these men, because at the time when the wrongs complained of were alleged to have been committed they were State officers. If this be true, I say that a fortiori it is the duty of the Government of the United States to follow its officers with its protecting power at all times and under all circumstances. Whether the wrong alleged has been really committed, whether the action of the officers of the United States has been wrongful or rightful, can only be ascertained when the case is finally tried.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman one question at this point. Suppose that upon examination in the Federal court it is ascertained that the offense charged was not committed while the officer was acting under color of his office, but that he had committed some crime in violation of State law—for instance murder; then what will be done with the case?

Mr. URNER. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question. If such be the circumstance, then the official character of the man is no defense, but according to this amendment he will be prosecuted and tried, and if necessary will be hanged, according to the provisions of the State law, administered in his case by the United States court.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a point of order. The morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The morning hour has expired. This bill goes over until Tuesday next. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. URNER] has twenty minutes of his hour remaining.

COINAGE CERTIFICATES, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to section 3.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to raise the question whether the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is in order—whether it is germane to the section to which it purports to be an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is too late now to make the point of order; it should have been made when the amendment was offered. The Chair need not therefore inquire whether the amendment is germane or not.

Mr. WARNER. I reserved all points of order.

The SPEAKER. When?

Mr. WARNER. Yesterday, at the time this amendment was under discussion.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois has been in the RECORD for several days.

Mr. BELFORD. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I have offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "bullion," in the fourth line of Mr. SPRINGER's amendment, the words "mined and produced from the mines of the United States;" so as to read:

Any owner of silver bullion mined and produced from the mines of the United States, may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into bars of fine silver or coined into standard silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, &c.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, when a few days ago I offered an amendment similar to this, which I thought would protect American silver against foreign competition, I expected that the amendment would receive the vote of my friends from Pennsylvania who during the past twenty-five years have advocated without cessation the protection of pig-iron. I thought that if it is a good thing to protect pig-iron in Pennsylvania it is an equally good thing to protect silver in Colorado.

During the last eight years several causes have contributed to effect a depreciation in the value of silver. These causes are both foreign and domestic. Among the foreign causes I will mention the demonetization of silver in Germany and in the Scandinavian states, the cessation of coinage in the Latin states, the hostility to silver in Holland, the edict of the King of Spain by which private individuals were prohibited from depositing their silver bullion in the mints of that country for coinage. These are the causes originating in foreign countries which have operated to depreciate the value of silver. The causes arising in this country which have effected a depreciation in the value of silver may be classed as follows: first, the demonetizing act of 1873; secondly, the vastly increased production of silver in the States of Colorado and Nevada within the last few years. Over only a part of these causes has this Congress any control. We cannot control the action of Germany on this subject; we cannot control the action of the states forming the Latin union; we cannot control the action of Spain; yet, under the policy of this bill, all these nations may ship their silver to this country, deposit it in the mints for free coinage, and on every ounce of silver may make a profit of fifteen cents. I say, gentlemen, that is a fraud, and that is the only term which can be rightly applied to it.

Now, I wish to say another word in this connection. This House determined the other day, notwithstanding the owner of silver bullion reaps a profit of fifteen cents on every dollar coined, that that benefit should go alike to the owner of foreign bullion as well as to the American producer. I say if that profit is to be realized, and it will be realized when this bill becomes the law, let us confine the benefit of it to the producers in this country.

There is one reason why gold is coined free that does not obtain with reference to silver. All the commercial nations of the world hoard gold, and if we should make a charge for its coinage it would go to other nations whose anxiety to secure it has prompted them to coin it freely and without cost. Silver being demonetized in Germany, in the states of the Latin union, and its free coinage being no longer possible in Spain, there is no demand for it abroad. These facts have induced many able men in both Houses of Congress and men of all parties to resist the free coinage of silver. No man questions the statement that the metal that composes the silver dollar is worth but eighty-five cents. You take, then, but eighty-five cents' worth of metal to the mint; it is coined into a dollar; and by operation of the legal-tender act fifteen cents are added to its value. In other words, the man who owns the metal makes fifteen cents on every dollar that he has coined. Now, sir, shall this profit go into the pocket of every man who brings silver here from Germany and Holland and Spain? Shall we give this advantage and profit to the foreigner or to the citizens of this nation? I am in favor of protecting home industries. I am in favor, if we are going to give a profit to any one, to give it to our own mine-owners and bullion-producers. I am opposed to making this nation the dumping-ground for the whole world. If foreign nations will conspire to degrade the value of silver abroad we should not allow their citizens to reap a rich harvest by the institution of free coinage here. If they bring their silver here they should pay for having it coined. This is the just course. I have offered my amendment because I wished to strike out as far as possible any mischievous features contained in the bill. Many members declare that this bill is pregnant with mischief; if so, let us limit the mischief as far as possible. I want to see coinage unlimited. I want to see it free so far as concerns our own citizens; but I think it unwise to extend these privileges to those who bear no part of our national burdens and who bring their bullion here simply to derive a profit from the liberality of our laws.

I wish to call the attention of the House to another matter growing out of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] If that amendment be adopted in its present shape, it practically rules out my constituents from having any benefit under the section. If I am the owner of silver bullion and desire to deposit it and obtain a certificate, this amendment requires me to take it to a coinage mint. I cannot take it to the branch mint at Denver, because we have no coinage there; hence, if the amendment be adopted, the bullion-producers of Colorado must ship their bullion to Philadelphia or New Orleans, or some other point in this country where they have a coinage mint. Under the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, I take it that the Secretary of the Treasury can only issue certificates for the bullion that is deposited at coinage mints.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I oppose this amendment, but I will be glad to yield my time to have the gentleman from Colorado finish his remarks.

Mr. WARNER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BELFORD. I cannot yield.

Mr. WARNER. Then I object. I only wish to ask a single question.

Mr. SAPP. Withdraw your objection; you have got in on everybody here. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman from Connecticut yielding his time to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I hope my friend from Illinois will give me his attention, because I wish to discuss his amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am listening to the gentleman.

Mr. BELFORD. I think the gentleman from Illinois should amend his amendment in one respect. As it is now drawn that amendment applies purely and solely to coinage mints. If I am the owner of silver bullion I can take it to the coinage mint and there deposit it, and then this act provides it may be converted into silver dollars; that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue a certificate representing the amount of bullion deposited. Take the people of my State; this year we will produce sixteen to twenty millions of silver, and, under the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois as it is now drawn, we shall have to ship all to some coinage mint where the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue his certificate. We shall not be able to deposit it at the branch mint of Denver, because the branch is not clothed with coinage powers. If that amendment is to become a law, I think the gentleman ought at least to extend its provisions to the people of my State, and not put an enactment upon the statute-book requiring them to ship their silver bullion to Philadelphia or New Orleans or some other place for the purpose of having it coined.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. WARNER. I object to any amendment going in if my objection will keep it out.

The SPEAKER. After the amendment to the amendment now pending has been disposed of, it will then be in order to move another amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand the gentleman from Illinois accepts my amendment as a modification of his substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to accepting that amendment as a modification of mine.

Mr. WARNER. Is it in order to object to that?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman has the control of his own amendment, the previous question not having been seconded.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman state where his amendment will come in?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado will put his suggestion in writing. The Chair will cause to be read a clause from the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motions may be modified before the previous question is seconded, and before a decision or amendment, but not after the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. Analogous to that, the privilege has always been allowed in the House that a member offering an amendment could modify on suggestion or on his own volition the amendment he has offered prior to the operation of the previous question.

Mr. WARNER. Can that be done except by consent?

Mr. CONGER. There is nothing to prevent the gentleman from Ohio asking unanimous consent to object, is there?

Mr. WARNER. I hope I will not be obliged to ask the consent of my friend from Michigan if I choose to object. I desire to make an inquiry. Can amendments be offered in this way by one gentleman and accepted by another if there is objection?

The SPEAKER. The practice has been usual, the Chair thinks, to allow a gentleman who has offered an amendment to modify his own amendment on the suggestion of another member or on his own volition before the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. ATKINS. Suppose it is a change in the substance of the amendment, Mr. Speaker, then what has been the ruling?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine. It is not a question of order for the Chair to decide. The House determines that by a vote.

Mr. ATKINS. It then becomes a matter for consent by the House, I suppose; and then one single objection would defeat it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The remedy is in the House. The Chair is simply administering the rule and the practice as laid down in the Manual which is adopted as part of the rules.

Mr. BELFORD. I send up the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois has accepted as part of his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "mint," in line 5 of Mr. SPRINGER's amendment, add the words "or branch mint or assay office;" so that it will read:

Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint or branch mint or assay office to be formed, &c.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the amendment heretofore offered by the gentleman from Colorado with respect to the products of American mines now pending?

The SPEAKER. It is pending as an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think there is a misapprehension in the minds of some members as to the effect of the amendment I have proposed. I have drawn it very carefully and after very mature deliberation. The only difference between my amendment and the bill reported from the committee in reference to free coinage is this, that by my amendment the difference between the present bullion value of silver and the nominal value of the silver dollars will inure to the Government of the United States instead of to the bullion-owner. I am asked whether we can accomplish this by legislation. I say we can, and that this amendment does accomplish it. Gentlemen confront me with abstract principles of political economy and finance. I am willing to listen to all of them. I believe in the theory of a bimetallic system. I am opposed to the single gold standard. I believe in the double standard.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I understood my colleague to say he is opposed to the gold standard. I now ask him whether under the operation of this amendment gold is not made the only standard?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer my colleague.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask you further, how do you determine the market value of silver except by comparison with gold?

Mr. SPRINGER. The standard of values under the existing law in the United States to-day is not gold, but gold and coined silver dollars. That is the standard of value and that is the standard which is recognized by my amendment and not the gold standard in the absence of any silver coinage.

We are now, Mr. Speaker, confronted with this condition of things: we desire to replace silver in the coinage of the country, and at the same time we have before us to be met as a fact the present depreciation of silver bullion amounting to more than 15 per cent. on the dollar. Now, when we consider these two facts our theories must to some extent give way and we must meet these two facts as they exist. I believe that the amendment which I have offered does meet that condition of things and in a way that will solve the whole question of the complete remonetization of silver notwithstanding the enormous depreciation of silver bullion at this time. It does it in this way: it authorizes the owner of the silver bullion to place it on deposit in the Treasury of the United States. It requires the Secretary of the Treasury to issue for every 412½ grains of standard silver so deposited a certificate. That certificate represents the number of grains deposited; but under this bill the certificate is made receivable for customs dues and all taxes to the Government, and therefore takes its place in the money of the country as worth one silver dollar of 412½ grains coined, or as worth a dollar or one hundred cents to the Government, being received for that in the shape of taxes.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Who fixes the market value of the bullion?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer that question in a moment. Now, my amendment gives to the owner of the bullion what his bullion is worth in the market, namely, eighty-four cents and not one hundred cents, which his bullion is not worth. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] asks me who fixes the market value of the bullion. I ask him who fixes the market value of wheat or corn? Is it the Secretary of the Treasury? Why, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury fixes the market value of nothing. Market value is something beyond the reach of law-makers and law-executors. It is fixed by commerce and by the law of supply and demand. That is what establishes the market value of silver bullion. And the Secretary is to receive these deposits at that market value, which is just as easily ascertained as the market value of United States bonds. Commercial usage settles the question in all cases and leaves no room for dispute.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to ask my colleague one question. I understand that the object of this bill is to give relief to the country. Now, I ask my colleague whether, if we were devising measures for the relief of a famine by collecting all the grain in the country to be made into breadstuffs, he would feel it to be his Christian duty to toll that grain to keep the miller? That is what he proposes to do. The purport of his amendment I understand. The ostensible object is to pay into the Treasury the difference between the market and the par-value measure by gold. While that is the ostensible object, the real effect is to make gold the standard.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to occupy the floor for five minutes longer, as I have been interrupted, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] having had the same privilege.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

Mr. SPRINGER. My colleague has asked me a question, and has done me the kindness to answer it himself.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I beg my colleague's pardon. I have not answered the question at all; I want him to answer it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer it, then. We are not passing a law to-day to raise the price of wheat in the country twenty-five cents per bushel, but we are proposing to pass a law to raise the price of silver bullion 15 per cent. on its present market value, and you are proposing to make the people of the United States pay this difference between the present price of bullion and the price that will be given to it by this legislation.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHITE. We would like very much to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] on the silver question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman from Illinois claim that the effect of this bill would be to raise silver up to the present level of gold and add 15 per cent. to its present value? Will the bill have that effect? If not, where is his 15 per cent.?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman asks me whether the bill will have the effect of raising the price of silver bullion up to the present value of the coined silver dollar? I do not know whether it will or not.

Mr. WARNER. Then where is the 15 per cent.?

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot tell.

Mr. WARNER. I think not.

Mr. SPRINGER. But if it does raise it to that extent, the people will have the benefit of the difference during the time the rise is taking place. That is what my amendment means.

One word further. I want those gentlemen of the House who are in favor of a double standard to have an opportunity of voting for it without having to carry this great load that is heaped upon us by gentlemen who are in favor of a single standard, and who have announced their opinion in speeches here—I refer to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORTON,] whom I see before me.

Mr. WARNER. They are all for your amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman says they are all for my amendment; I hope they are.

Mr. WARNER. They are all for it; every one of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORTON] stated in his speech that if this bill were to become a law, the German government and all those countries who have silver bullion would pour it into our mints and receive for eighty-four cents a silver dollar and make nearly 20 per cent., and our own people would be the losers. A similar statement was made by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. DEUSTER,] by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] and by my colleague, [Mr. FORT.]

Mr. BUCKNER. That proposition has been denied upon this side.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that it has been denied; it is a disputed point. While on the other side of the House we are confronted with the statement that we are passing a bill in the interest of the bullion-jobbers of the country, on this side we have only to reply that we are not doing it. What is the practical effect of the pending bill without my amendment? This bill provides that for every 412½ grains of bullion in the country at this time or to be brought into the country thereafter, we will substitute a legal-tender silver dollar, and that amount of bullion is only worth eighty-four cents to-day.

Now, I am in favor of doing that thing, but I am in favor of giving the Government of the United States the benefit of that difference. We will put it in the Treasury and keep it there as a trust fund for the whole people of the United States. [Applause on the republican side of the House.]

I am very much gratified at the compliment which my friends on the other side have given me, and if they will go with me and pass a bill of this kind, we will put all the silver in the country in the process of becoming an instrument for carrying on the trade and commerce of the world, every dollar of 412½ grains representing a legal-tender dollar.

This amendment accomplishes that, and gives the whole benefit to the people instead of to the owners of the bullion.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Mr. Speaker, I must necessarily oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] Though less objectionable in degree, it contains the same element of evil as section 8 of the bill, as to which I have submitted an amendment to strike out the whole section. Section 8 authorizes the issuing by the Treasury of gold and silver certificates. The amendment pending also provides for like certificates. In that respect it is not germane to the question of coinage. It is part of a financial or credit scheme. It belongs to a class of measures adopted during the war period as expedients to raise money on credit.

We have passed the period for such expedients. An era of peace now lasting more than ten years should introduce us to a different class of laws. Doubtful expedients are at times prudential measures; but that applies to desperate situations. It does not apply to the present situation of our Government, which is now in such excellent credit at home and abroad that ordinary bonds are in very great demand. There is no reason now that the public debt should be so variegated in kind and color as the needs of the war required.

I have examined the pedigree of the eighth section. It is section 254 of the Revised Statutes with the word silver interpolated so as to put silver bullion and coin certificates in the same situation as gold. Section 254 of the Revised Statutes is section 5 of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government." That act provided for an issue of bonds, Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, and for issuing one hundred and fifty millions in United States notes to pay the Army. It levied a duty on bank circulation and deposits. It was a war measure and can furnish no precedent for these times of peace. It is thought by some that the section referred to was modeled after a provision in the minting act which provides for a certificate for bullion deposits at the Mint. It is true that these certificates were transferable, and were in fact used as exchange in trade. But they were not Government certificates. They were only receipts for bullion to be paid in specific bullion or coin from the Mint. (See act February 12, 1873, section 4.)

I am informed that section 254, which provides for gold certificates, has not been in use since the war period, and the gold coinage has been carried on under the minting laws as they were revised in 1873.

The fifth section in the law of 1863 was adopted to get out more paper based on the gold that came into the Treasury. It was an expedient to raise money. It could have no other purpose. It is not needed now when the Government has a plethora of available funds without such expedient. At this time our national finances are not in embarrassment. The Government has resumed specie payments. A new suspension can only happen by incurring extraordinary expenses or by the creation of a demand indebtedness, which may be called unexpectedly and in large amounts. These certificates would constitute such a danger.

Our trade with foreign countries is now in healthy condition. We have a balance of trade from the most healthy possible source. Our agricultural productions form the source which may be naturally expected in this country to be large when in healthy operation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not belong to either party urging or antagonizing silver coinage. I do not believe that the prosperity of the people depends upon a bimetallic system, nor do I believe that the fabric of the public credit will fall into helpless collapse, unless we adhere to a monometallic standard. In considering the question of a circulating medium—or a position somewhere between the two extreme theories may be at this time the safest.

Medio tutissimus ibis,

Altius egressus coelestia tecta cremabis
Inferius terras.

The people are not discontented, as has been said. There are cases of suffering from a temporarily deranged condition of manufactures. But there is no want among tillers of the soil except such as may result from ill-health, shiftlessness, or extravagance, or the incubus of the war debts. We cannot legislate away these ills. The people are naturally contented during democratic rule. Popular liberty is the great boon we are bound to keep secured to the people, and while that is guarded they may be trusted to work out the problems of bread-winning and property acquisition and business thrift.

There may be a lurking danger in the bill, as to which its friends have not been able to put my mind at rest. Silver is now very cheap. No one can safely say how the future price will be. It depends upon the amount of silver existing and being produced. Writers differ very largely in estimating both factors in the computation. While it is unknown, even to an approximate extent, how much gold and silver is stored in the commercial world, all action based upon such computation must be dangerous for its uncertainty.

We must not legislate against the interests of the Government. It belongs to the whole people, and if by our action the people suffer a loss, they will and should hold us responsible, because it must be borne by the people. It cannot be shifted off their shoulders upon the President or the Cabinet or the individual members of Congress. The blame may be placed there, but the burden of the loss must be borne by the people, who constitute the Government and create and own its resources. The Government is now buying cheap silver; perhaps it was never cheaper as a commodity. The coin resulting from these purchases is very likely to remain worth its cost under all the contingencies that may happen.

If the silver stored in this country and among foreign nations and the productions of the mines are to be dumped bodily into the Government vaults, at par of the Government standard, I am not prepared to say that the people will not suffer heavy loss by the depreciation on so large a stock. But I am not discussing that subject. I am deprecating the effect of the eighth section. It makes the Government Treasury a huge bank of issue upon the basis of its coin. This coin should be held religiously, honestly, as security for the redemption of the United States notes now in circulation. It is only so we can maintain resumption. It is unwise—I think it criminal—to destroy the coin reserve as a trust fund to the holders of the Government paper money by creating a new liability in the form of certificates for which it is pledged.

Rome from its founding by Romulus for five hundred years, if history is any guide, delivered no battle to its enemies and undertook no great matter of public administration unless the augurs were first consulted. The general did not engage his troops nor the statesman frame a declaration of war unless he was guided by the flight of birds or the viscera of the sacrifices. It is well to believe as we read such history, in the light of the continued growth of the nation, that the priests who examined the auspices were themselves the most learned of the patrician order. They must have known the facts existing and the situation of the hostile forces. It is necessary to believe that the wisdom of the priests did much to enlighten the interpretation of the manifestations of the gods in which the peoples put their faith. I would not have the ministers at this altar of the people act less wisely in the interpretation of the auguries. It may not be wise to embark in the experiment of this measure, unless we can first know the factors and strength of the forces upon which success or failure is to depend. It is certainly unwise to give, as we will by enacting the eighth section of this bill, a large addition to a power now held by the Treasury to do a banking business upon the coin reserve intended to be held as a deposit against the United States notes now outstanding.

Mr. BUCKNER. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is to my mind an exceedingly artful and insidious one, and utterly destructive of the whole principle and theory upon which the bill is based. The section which he proposes to amend gives to the owner of silver bullion the right to have it coined into silver dollars for his benefit. In that respect it puts silver upon the same footing with gold. That is what it means and nothing else. The whole theory of bimetalism is that the silver or the gold has a certain intrinsic value, and with the stamp of the Government upon it it becomes money. The object of this side of the House is to put both of these metals upon the same footing as to coinage.

The gentleman from Illinois says he wants to do the same thing. I say that his amendment is worse upon the silver dollar than the proposition of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is to stop coining silver dollars when the amount of fifty millions has been coined. We have now about thirty millions coined. I undertake to say that this proposed amendment would cut the throat of the silver dollar, and if it shall become law there can be no more coinage of silver dollars under it.

There is a great deal said in this amendment about coining a silver dollar of 412½ grains. How can it be coined except under the provisions of this bill, allowing parties to take it to the Treasury and receive certificates of deposit for it? If he is to receive the certificate at its market value, what advantage is there? The Secretary of the Treasury would then have the right to coin it, for he is giving certificates which for many purposes would pass as money, and the bullion deposited becomes the property of the Government, and under the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would be subject to coinage.

Now, what inducement does my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] offer to the bullion-holder to take his bullion to the Treasury which he does not now have? He can get the market value of his bullion anywhere, get it in gold or in greenbacks, and that is all the gentleman proposes to give him. What man holding silver bullion is such a simpleton that he would deposit it in the Treasury for the purpose of obtaining no more than the market price of his silver? Who would put bullion there at that rate? And if nobody would do it—and I undertake to say that nobody would do it—then not a single dollar would be coined under this amendment.

Let us look at this matter. A great deal is said in the proposed amendment about coining the silver dollar. It provides that the bullion may be deposited in the Treasury, and instructs the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the market value of the silver bullion at the time it is deposited, and to issue therefor certificates, &c. Silver bullion is now worth about eighty-four and one-half cents. Therefore the depositors would get for 412½ grains of bullion a certificate for eighty-four and one-half cents, for that is the market rate. Now he can get that market rate anywhere. Is that any inducement to him to deposit his silver? And yet that is every particle of the amendment which makes any provision for coining silver dollars. It is proposed that the silver bullion shall be deposited in the mint and paid for at the discount between the coined silver and bullion silver that now exists, and it is said that then the Government will coin it. The Government would have a right to coin it then, but that is just what is going on now.

Mr. ATKINS. If the Secretary of the Treasury is unfriendly, would not the bullion-holder be at a disadvantage?

Mr. BUCKNER. The Secretary of the Treasury would say that it should be coined to the capacity of the mint. We have now a mandatory provision upon the Secretary of the Treasury to coin $2,000,000 a month; that is a thousand times better than it would be to adopt this amendment. For one, if this amendment is put upon the bill, I shall vote against it, and every man who understands this question ought to vote against it, for it will be putting in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the very power which we do not want him to exercise, the power to prevent the coinage of the silver dollar.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Mr. Speaker, in the five minutes that is granted to any one to say anything on this bill it will be difficult to beat out much wheat from the great amount of straw which is presented here, or, if you please, to gather a few grains from the immense amount of chaff which has been thrown into this House concerning this bill.

I have listened to the various theories presented here. On the one side a gentleman says that this bill will advance the price of property everywhere. The next moment another gentleman says that if you pass this bill it will advance the price of silver bullion. Now, who shall decide? These are nothing but theories based upon a partial and one-sided view. They remind one of the story of the old knights who fought upon a dispute about a shield. As you approached the shield on one side it appeared to be of silver; as you approached it upon the other, it appeared to be of gold. These theories are not based at all upon facts, but upon opinions, sheer guessing of the wildest kind.

If I had the time I would like to examine this bill practically and demonstrate what it is. But I have time only to refer to one or two sections of it.

Section 3 of the bill provides in substance that any owner of silver bullion may deposit it in the Mint and have it coined. Section 8 of the bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury for the bullion received may issue silver dollars, or in place thereof may issue certificates. For what? For the silver bullion, dollars to the amount of its value. And it then provides—and it is a most extraordinary provision—that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue certificates for not more than 20 per cent. above the amount of coin and bullion so deposited in the Treasury. Now, what in the mischief does that mean? He is to issue certificates for the bullion, and then he is to issue certificates for 20 per cent. more. Now, what does that 20 per cent. represent? It is simply fiat money. A certified lie; that is, a certificate that there is silver in the Treasury representing this 20 per cent. when in fact it is not there.

And I want to say right here to the gentlemen on the other side, representing the great democratic party, which my friend from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] in his speech attached to the greenback party as a kind of gentle appendage that waves in the air, that the aforesaid democratic party, by this bill, are being attached to the greenbackers, as a fiat tail, and they do an immense amount of wagging at both extremities.

Just how this is done will be most clearly shown before I have finished.

A few moments ago a gentleman said on this question that the passage of this bill would advance the price of silver bullion in this country. What does that mean? If that is not legislation for the rich, for the silver men, for the holders of bullion, for banks and brokers, for the owners of the bonanza mines, then I cannot understand language. That is precisely what it means—it means nothing else.

Why are our streets here to-day filled with the very men who own the silver mines, who have piled up the bullion in New York City and in the Treasury of the United States, if it is not for the purpose of lobbying through this bill for their benefit?

Mr. WARNER rose.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I am sorry the House occasionally "sits down" on the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] so hard; but if he would allow one gentleman to make a speech on this bill without interrupting him, I think he would receive a vote of thanks, and so far as I am concerned I propose there shall be one speech made in this House that shall not be so interrupted. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman shall not be interrupted by me.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I hope not.

WHO OWNS THE SILVER?

The promoters of this bill propose to enact that eighty-five cents' worth of silver shall be a dollar to any and all unlimited amounts; that any man who has gold or legal-tender money may buy silver bullion or French silver coins or German or English, and for every eighty-five cents in gold he may buy 412½ grains of standard silver and deposit it in the Treasury and receive a legal-tender dollar of one hundred cents; and you voted down an amendment providing that it should apply only to United States bullion. You may explain and argue and throw dust, but that is the plain English of this bill, and the people so understand it. You may talk about the "dollar of your fathers," but the people know that you are trying to legislate that every bank and banker who has eighty-five cents' worth of silver shall have one hundred cents of silver dollar, made legal tender by this bill, from the Treasury of the United States whenever they deposit the silver.

Now, this being so, will you tell me why do you waste so much silver? Why do you put in eighty-five cents' worth of silver? Why put in more than forty-two and a half cents' worth of silver in the dollar? Why are you so mean, so dishonest, as to compel any of these poor holders of silver bullion, these ragged, destitute bonanza silver-kings to hand up to the Treasury eighty-five cents' worth of silver to be called a dollar?

Do you say, because the dollar of our fathers weighed 412½ grains and it requires eighty-five cents' worth of silver to make the proper weight?

If this is all, take forty-two and a half cents' worth of silver, and make up the balance of weight in copper or fiat. It is wrong, on your theory, to waste the silver. And so to carry out your theory to its logical conclusion, take one cents' worth of silver and copper enough to make the proper weight, about one cents' worth, and make that the standard and declare it to be a dollar, legal tender.

Then, one step further, and you see the logical conclusion of the theory on which this bill is passed. Enact the following as an additional section, copied exactly after section 3520 quoted in this bill:

"Any owner of bank or legal-tender paper or paper pulp of the proper characteristics as required by law may deposit the same at any mint or in the Treasury of the United States, to be formed into legal-tender notes of the same weight, and particularly of the same length, breadth, and thickness of the legal-tender note, for his benefit; and no deposit of bank or legal-tender paper or pulp for other manufacture into legal-tender notes shall be received." [Laughter.]

That it shall be lawful to refuse, at the Mint or Treasury, any deposit of paper of less value than $100 or any paper unsuitable for the operations of the Mint as herein provided.

Then add a section to provide for the expenses of printing, as is provided for coining silver. Then add a section that this legal-tender paper shall be coined or manufactured into the legal-tender notes, as the depositor may desire, or Treasury certificates of the amount of such notes, and make them receivable for all dues of the United States and exchangeable for blank paper or paper pulp, &c., &c., as in the present bill, and your system is complete. [Great laughter.]

You have now the "fiat dollar," pure and simple, redeemable in pulp. If you can "fiat" eighty-five cents to be worth one hundred cents, to an unlimited amount, you can "fiat" forty-two and a half cents of silver to be worth one hundred cents or one cent's worth of silver, or one cent's worth of paper. You can "fiat" a piece of bark or a wooden shingle, if of the required shape and size, worth half a cent, to the value of one hundred cents just as well. Gentlemen, in voting for this bill you see what a very small tail to the greenback kite you make yourselves.

A MONSTROUS WRONG ON THE PEOPLE.

I now want to point out a monstrous wrong that is attempted to be done by this bill. It is no wrong to the banks or bankers nor to the money-lenders nor to the rich. It is an inexcusable wrong to the people, to the working men and women of this land, the mechanic, laborer, and the farmer. It is a proposal to allow every person who has hired a man or woman in this land, and agreed to pay $1 a day, to discharge his obligation for eighty-five cents. Every workman who has been hired for $2 per day must receive two silver dollars that have cost only $1.70. Every man working hired for $60 a month must receive sixty silver dollars worth and costing only $51.

Your section 3585 provides that these dollars be a legal tender. What a reckoning you men will have for this wholesale attempt to swindle every workingman in the United States. What is your answer to this? Do you say wages will rise? How do you know they will? You are simply guessing at this. You are not prophets or sons of prophets. You have a priest among you, but he is no prophet or a son of a prophet.

ITS EFFECT ON THE WORKINGMAN.

There are about forty-six millions at least of people in this land. There are of laborers under wages at least one out of every six or seven persons. This includes laborers, servants, mechanics, clerks both male and female. This makes about seven million persons earning wages, and this estimate is much too low, whose pay is fixed by wages. The average of all would be about $1 per day. At $1 per day they will earn $7,000,000 per day; for the week, $42,000,000; for a month say $168,000,000; for the year, $2,016,000,000—a sum greater than the whole debt of the United States. Under this present bill, therefore, the man who hires and has $1,000 to pay his workman could, if this bill becomes a law, deposit $850 in value of silver—silver that he can buy in the market at that rate—in the Treasury of the United States and receive $1,000 in silver dollars, legal tender.

The wages of the workmen of this land are $7,000,000 per day and could be purchased for $5,800,000 in bullion silver. The rich manufacturer, railroad owners and all who pay labor, would save on labor in this country each day $1,200,000; each week, $7,200,000; each month, $30,000,000; each year, $360,000,000; and in five years the saving would be $1,800,000,000, or about the amount of the national debt. Thus it appears that the amount paid the laborers and workmen of this country each year exceeds the whole national debt, and the amount of money which would be unjustly taken from the laboring-men in five years, forced from them by this vile bill, is almost the total of the Government debt. A greenback document in my hands puts the amount of wages paid in this country per day at about $12,000,000, which would be per month $300,000,000; per year, $3,600,000,000. If this is so, the $12,000,000 of daily wages could be bought for about $10,000,000 in gold or paper money. So that the loss to laboring-men per day is $2,000,000; per month, $60,000,000; per year, $720,000,000, and in three years $2,160,000,000, or more than the whole debt of the nation.

You may say this is impossible, but such are the wrongs you, the democratic party, while trying to swallow the greenback, are seeking to perpetrate on the workingmen, the laborers, the mechanics of this country. This is equal to $45 per year for each of the seven million laborers of this land. The whole calculation is based on the same number; and whether you increase or diminish the number the ratio is the same. This is a confiscation at once of over one and one-half months' wages of each laborer in each year.

If the greenback statement of labor is correct, the loss to the laboring-men of the country is nearly double this per year. You may reply, but this matter will regulate itself. Wages will rise in the same proportion. Will it? How do you know? You are simply taking counsel of your hopes. You must say this to conform to your theory and to defend yourself. It is your only answer. But suppose you perchance are no better prophet than you are financier, and wages should not rise; or suppose, what is almost sure to be the case, all property rises, as always has been the case when you debase the unit or standard of value—suppose, I say, that property rises and labor does not; then you are doubly injuring and doing wrong to the laboring-man.

You are paying him, for what he made a contract for on a gold basis of money value at one hundred cents, in a debased silver coin worth only eighty-five cents, and at the same time you are reducing the purchasing power of that eighty-five cents' worth of silver by enhancing, under the inexorable laws of trade, the value of all property, bread and meat and clothing for the laborer to the same extent that you measure its value in a debased coin.

FIGURES TELL THE STORY.

The gentleman from Ohio, who has charge of the bill, in his opening speech, gave us the following figures as proving the necessity of this bill. He said the crop of wheat of 1869 was 300,000,000 bushels, was valued at $375,000,000. This would buy of pig-iron, average value $90 a ton in 1869, 4,167,000 tons. Crop of wheat of 1878, 422,000,000 bushels, value seventy-eight cents, $329,000,000. This would buy of pig-iron, average value $46 a ton, in 1878, 7,150,000 tons.

The wheat crop of 1878, therefore, would buy nearly 3,000,000 tons of iron more than the wheat crop of 1869. To make the comparison fair, however, we should take the same amount of wheat in 1878, thus: wheat, 1878, 300,000,000 bushels, same as in 1869, value, $234,000,000. This would buy of pig-iron, value $46 a ton, in 1878, 5,085,000 tons; a benefit to the farmer in the value of his wheat crop, measuring by its purchasing power, of 2,065,000 tons of pig-iron.

Crop of corn, 1869, 900,000,000 bushels, $450,000,000 in value. This amount would buy of pig-iron, at $90 per ton, average price 1869, 5,000,000 tons. Crop of corn, 1878, 1,371,000,000 bushels, $436,000,000 in value. This amount would buy of pig-iron, at $46 per ton, average price 1878, 9,480,000 tons, a difference of 4,480,000 tons; or the corn crop of 1878 would purchase almost double the amount of iron that the corn crop of 1869 would buy. And yet these figures are paraded with that extraordinary flourish which supposes the fact is established that the farmers were so much worse off than in 1869.

But to make this entirely fair to the gentleman, the same amount of corn should be taken, thus:

In 1878, 900,000,000 bushels corn were worth $288,000,000. This amount would buy of pig-iron at $46 per ton, (average price in 1878,) 6,260,000 tons—a benefit to the farmer in the value of his corn crop, measured by its purchasing power, of 1,260,000 tons of iron.

In 1869, the potato crop amounted to 150,000,000 bushels, which, at 60 cents per bushel, was worth $90,000,000. This would buy of pig-iron, at $90 a ton, 1,000,000 tons. In 1878, the potato crop amounted to 125,000,000 bushels, which, at 58½ cents per bushel, was worth $73,000,000. This would buy of pig-iron, at $46 a ton, 1,574,000 tons—an absolute benefit to the farmer, because a less crop by 25,000,000 bushels will buy 574,000 tons more of iron. The same amount of potato crop would buy nearly double the amount of iron.

I have thus taken the figures and articles referred to of the gentleman from Ohio and compared the several farm productions of the different years, as he did not, and on his own basis of figures, to find how they compared in purchasing power. This shows that from 1869 to 1878 the farmer's condition under the present financial laws has steadily and constantly improved. What is true of pig-iron is equally true of most articles that farmers buy.

The gentleman loses sight of the fact—that is, he appears to lose sight of it, but his intelligence is too great for him to plead ignorance of the fact that the purchasing power of the dollar has steadily and constantly increased, and to the benefit of the farmer and laborer. A bushel of wheat would buy more of the articles that the farmer or the laboring-man is obliged to purchase in 1878 than it would in 1869. And the figures given above directly from the speech of the gentleman who has charge of the bill show it conclusively. But it did not suit his argument to carry his results to their logical conclusion, and he imagined it would not be discovered. Be careful how you wrestle with figures; they sometimes throw you in the most unaccountable way. Again, he says common labor averaged in 1873 $1.60 in currency; common labor averaged in 1879 $1.05. In another place he says ninety cents; "a difference of more than 31 per cent."

The gentleman says the difference in purchasing power is now 30 per cent., that is that the dollar will purchase 30 per cent. more of necessary articles now than then. If this is true then the purchasing power of his wages has increased just as the price of articles has decreased, and the dollar purchases just the same.

But in another place he gives it quite differently. His figures and ratios depend on what use he desires to make of them. He makes one bushel of wheat in 1873 one and twenty one-hundredths of a silver ounce. He makes common labor in 1872 the same, one and twenty one-hundredths. So that a day's labor and a bushel of wheat are of the same value in 1873.

But, he says, in 1879 the bushel of wheat is eighty one-hundredths of an ounce of silver, and the day's labor ninety-one one-hundredths of an ounce of silver. Then, in 1873, the day's labor will buy one bushel of wheat, and in 1879 the day's labor will buy one and one-ninth bushels of wheat. The purchasing power of the laborer's day's labor has increased just one-ninth of a bushel of wheat.

These facts are too significant in this discussion to be passed over lightly. They are decisive, and establish that the laborer's condition to-day under present price of labor and commodities has steadily improved.

He gives these illustrations as samples and a fair average of other products, and if carried to their logical conclusion they prove exactly the opposite of what he claims as proven. They prove that labor receives a greater reward now per diem than in 1873.

MAKES THE RICH RICHER, THE POOR POORER.

This bill, therefore, I contend increases the wealth of the rich by one act of legislation about 17½ per cent., and this was so argued in this House, that every bond, every railroad, every bank, all the property of the rich must be made of more value, and it was so designed. It was property against capital, and another said it would increase the price of silver and bullion. To-day the value of all property is measured by the unit of value, the gold dollar, worth one hundred cents. Suppose a man has $100,000 in gold or legal-tender notes to-day. To-morrow, knowing this law will be passed, he buys at market value, rating silver at eighty-five cents for 412½ grains standard coin silver, $117,710. He then deposits this with the Treasurer and receives in silver dollars or silver certificates $117,710—a clear profit by this one transaction of $17,710 if this law is passed. But suppose he has $10,000,000; he makes $1,171,000.

Now, what is true of gold being enhanced in value by this law applies equally to all property. If a man to-day has a block of buildings, or railroad stocks, or bank stock, or bonds, &c., &c., worth $100,000 in gold, you debase his unit or measure of value to eighty-five cents on the dollar, or 17½ per cent.; his property to-morrow, when this bill becomes a law, is worth by the new standard 17½ per cent. more or $117,100; ten million dollars' worth of property under gold value to-day becomes to-morrow $11,710,000, a profit of $1,710,000. This is one of the laws of trade, and is as inexorable as the laws of the Medes and Persians.

If a man has one hundred bushels of wheat measured by the present standard, and worth $1 per bushel, and you decrease the size of the measure 17½ per cent. and remeasure it, he will have one hundred and seventeen bushels; if he has one hundred cords of wood, one hundred and twenty-eight solid feet each cord, and you reduce it 17½ per cent., to one hundred and seven and a half solid feet, he will have one hundred and seventeen cords of wood; and if at the same time you reduce the unit of value so that $100 in gold will buy $117 in silver, then the wood in the market will be worth $117; and the wheat will be worth $117 in the debased coin.

Now, then, the laboring-man, or the hired man, or the man working by the year whose wages are to-day $1 per day, when he receives his wages one month after this bill is passed receives his $25 per month. And whereas now it would buy twenty-five bushels of wheat or twenty-five cords of wood, yet when this law is in force it will buy only twenty-one and one-third bushels of wheat or twenty-one and one-third cords of wood. You may say that the price of labor will advance, but, as I said before, this is a mere guess or expressed wish, for you well know that the price of labor is governed by the demand, and that will not be affected by this law.

I charge, then, the democratic party as having joined hands with the greenback party, and as legislating directly against the laborers and producing classes, and directly in favor of the rich and property-holders. They may be hoodwinked or misled, but it does not alter the fact.

WHY LEGISLATE FOR THE RICH?

Having shown that your pretenses are false, that you hypocritically say, that your action is for the laborers, while your acts are directly and substantially and only in favor of the moneyed classes, I ask, why do you legislate for the rich? Who will be injured if you do what is just and right and honest? We have no right to legislate to the injury of any one, rich or poor. If you wish to punish any one, first by law make it a crime to do the thing you object to and then fix the penalty.

Listening to the violent denunciations one might well imagine it was a high crime and misdemeanor for any one in this land to own houses and lands and railroads and banks and manufactories; that it was a State-prison offense for any one to have been guilty of loaning money to the Government to aid it in carrying on a war for the salvation of this Union; and, now, that the bondholder was a robber and a thief for holding the bonds or receiving interest thereon, and that the legislation of the country should be so guided and directed that all that hold property of any kind were to be punished; that any man who by industry and economy has dared to acquire any wealth for his old age, to bestow on his family, his children, or in charity, was an enemy to the laws and country, and the financial legislation of the country must be so directed that his wealth must be dissipated. You mean to do this, if you know enough, or can get bad men enough to help you. If you succeed you dig your own graves.

The legislation in this matter should be just. Property and labor have adjusted themselves to the relative values of gold and silver as they exist now. This relative value should be recognized now in our legislation; the weight of our coins should be adjusted to this ratio and it will injure no one. Who will be injured by putting one hundred cents' worth of silver instead of eighty-five cents' worth in the dollar? Who? It will not increase the value of all the silver held by banks, bankers, bonanza miners, and silver speculators. It will not enable the rich employer to buy a silver dollar for eighty-five cents in legal tender and pay his employés the silver dollar and thus make 17½ per cent. out of the poor. It will not add 17½ per cent. in value to all the money in hands of banks and bankers, to all the stock and bonds and mortgages, to all the railroads, land grants, and manufactures of the country. It will be an act of justice to all, rich and poor alike.

The people demand, trade requires, industry languishes for, a dollar of gold, paper, or silver worth one hundred cents under any and all circumstances, redeemable and interchangeable each with the other in the same unlimited manner, by the laws of equity and justice as well as by force of law.

1. To insure this the bimetallic standard is essential, and should be established and maintained.

2. The market ratio between the two as now existing should be recognized, established, and maintained.

3. Gold and silver certificates to a limited amount, based on coin in the Treasury not otherwise pledged, might possibly be issued, receivable for all public and private dues, without danger, but it is an untried experiment.

4. Paper money or certificates or greenbacks as legal-tender should be issued by the Government sufficient for the wants of trade, manufactures, and commerce, but never more than can be maintained at par, due consideration being given at all times to the pledges and covenants of the Government in that behalf given.

A BONANZA.

This bill is a bonanza to the rich. Do you ask how? Read section 3620 as amended and section 254 as amended. This is what can be done practically under these sections: any man, bank, or banker having $85 can buy one hundred dollars' worth of silver; having $8,500 can buy ten thousand dollars' worth of silver; and any banker or syndicate of banks in this country or in the Old World having $85,000,000 of silver—and that is not such a large amount after all, considering that the other day a few banks took $190,000,000 of four percents in a single bid—I say with $85,000,000 they can buy one hundred million dollars' worth of silver bullion, can deposit it with the Treasury and receive certificates or legal-tender money of the United States, and just exactly as good as the $85,000,000 of gold by which it is bought—a clean profit of $15,000,000 in one single transaction. This money can be paid out to every workingman for a dollar's full value of one hundred cents; to farmers for produce, for whatever grain, cattle, corn, they wish to sell, and as you have made it a legal-tender they must receive it. Your cotton, your tobacco, your sugar, men of the South, will be paid for in debased coin at eighty-five cents on the dollar.

The only commodity that is raised in this whole land that cannot be bought with this fraudulent, swindling, debased currency is the cussedness and h—l you raise in such abundance in the South, as my colleague from Michigan told you a few days ago. But, gentlemen, you will find that crop growing in much richer profusion both North and South, to your confusion, if you pass this ill-advised law.

SILVER KINGS ENRICHED.

There is another class of the rich who will be benefited by this law. That is the silver kings and princes, the bonanza lords and emperors of the far West. They mine silver worth eighty-five cents on the dollar, and they are here striving hard and bending all their efforts to have this bill passed. And so every owner of a silver mine or a share of stock is urging the passage of this bill. A more monstrous cheat and swindle of the people never was attempted, and if passed the time will come when its promoters must answer at the bar of a cheated people for the swindle.

Why should you give a man $1,000 in silver coin or legal-tender money which he can go into the market and buy for $850, thus giving the rich a glorious opportunity to grow richer? If this coining is to be done, why not let the Government make the 17½ per cent. profit, and thus it will inure to the profit and benefit of all the people, and will operate as a kind of forced tax and not go into the hands of brokers and bankers, bonanza kings and silver lords. If you are determined to do this great wrong, do it boldly; admit that you are doing it in the interest of the rich and to swindle the poor.

A POLITICAL CORNER.

You have attempted to get up a political corner on the republican party and the President by your riders on appropriation bills and have miserably failed.

A FINANCIAL CORNER.

You are now attempting a financial corner on the people, and if you should unhappily succeed it will be the most miserable failure in the long run of the two. It will but add one more to the failures and misadventures of the democratic party. Your attempt now, fail as you surely will, will be charged to you just the same as if you are successful.

REST.

What this country, this people, its trade, commerce, manufactures, its banks and bankers, the rich and poor alike, the workingman and mechanic, want and demand at our hands is a gold dollar, a silver dollar, a paper dollar worth one hundred cents, redeemable and interchangeable each with the other at all times, all places, and under all circumstances. And they want, more than all, rest from this constant tinkering of currency.

WHO OWNS THE GOLD?

The promoters of the present bill assert that by unjust legislation the value of the silver dollar, measured by gold, is too great; therefore by this bill they seek to reduce the value of the dollar measured by the same standard. That is, they will legislate that $85 in gold now shall possess the power to purchase $100 in silver. It will purchase the same weight of silver now, but the owner of the gold can only get eighty-five silver dollars for it at the Treasury.

Pass this bill, and the owner of the gold, purchasing the silver, can then for his $85 in gold receive one hundred silver dollars. Now, this is an enormous benefit to somebody.

Who owns the gold now, becomes a pertinent question. The owner of $100,000 in gold will be able at once to turn this into $117,500 silver. Who then will make, if this bill passes, $17,500 on every $100,000 in gold? Answer: the man who owns the gold. It is certainly not the poor man, the laboring-man, or the farmer who own the gold; but the gold is in the hands of the rich—the broker, the banker, the banks, the moneyed corporations of the land—and it is nowhere else. Here and there a few dollars may be found among the poor or the middle classes; but out of every $1,000, $999 is held by the wealthy corporations and men.

If this was but a small amount, it would not matter much, but when it is large the amount of profit is enormous. Thus the total amount of gold in this country as estimated by the Treasury Department was on June 30, 1878, $244,353,390. The production averages about (to present time) $36,000,000 or $40,000,000, a total now in the country of $280,353,390. The importations and exportations for same time are about equal.

Two hundred and eighty million dollars of gold are worth at present relative prices of gold and silver $328,000,000 in silver, and will buy that amount of silver bullion, which under this law could be deposited at the bank and silver dollars or silver certificates demanded therefor to the amount of $328,000,000, every one of which is legal tender.

Here is a profit to somebody of $48,000,000. Of this vast amount perhaps $1,000,000 may go into the pockets of the laboring-man and mechanic and $47,000,000 into the pockets of the rich, the banks, the bankers.

I ask again the promoters of this bill, the democrats, the greenbackers, hypocritical friends of the poor, how dare you face your constituents, with this huge swindle on your conscience, if you have any such thing about you?

I come back to the question, therefore,

WHO OWNS THE SILVER?

By this legislation every holder or owner of eighty-five cents' worth of silver bullion now in this country, or that will be produced while this law stands, is to be given one hundred cents for it in legal-tender coins or silver certificates on presentation at the Treasury.

Whosoever, therefore, owns the silver bullion, or produces it, by this legislation is to be benefited as before shown just 17½ per cent. The bullion is not in the hands of the common people, the laboring-men, the mechanics, or farmers. No; they may have silver coins to a small extent, as they all do more or less, but you are very careful not to legislate for their benefit. But the bullion-holders, the bullion-producers, the silver-mine owners—not the mine-workers; how careful you are not to benefit them to the amount of one cent—their silver is to be increased in value; for every eighty-five cents' worth of silver they are to receive one hundred cents in legal-tender coin. The total production of silver bullion is estimated by the Treasury Department at about $49,000,000 per year. This would be, for the last ten years ending June 30, 1878, $490,000,000, and for last nine months, estimated, $36,000,000—total, $526,000,000. Probably one-half of this amount is still in this country—say $200,000,000.

This amount, then, deposited in the Treasury would entitle the depositor to two hundred and thirty-seven millions in silver dollars, or a profit of $37,000,000 on the present stock of silver, as made by this bill; and on a production of $49,000,000 of silver bullion each year in this country, a profit of $8,570,000 per year to the—shall I say poor—the laborers, the mechanics, the farmers? No; most emphatically, no; but to the silver bankers, holders, and silver-mine owners.

Again, I ask you how will you face your swindled laboring constituents after voting for this law? I imagine my friends on the other side on the hustings, when seeking a re-election, asked: "Who voted for the silver bill that gave $48,000,000 of profit on gold to the rich bankers and brokers of the country, and nothing for the laborers and mechanics?" "Who voted for the silver bill that gave $37,000,000 profit to the holders of silver bullion and silver-mine owners, and nothing to the workingmen and farmers?" "Who voted for the silver bill that compelled every workingman and laborer who was hired for $1 per day in gold to take eighty-five cents' worth of silver?" "Who voted for the silver bill that compelled every mechanic and artisan who was hired for $2 per day to accept $1.70 per day as full payment?" "Who voted for the silver bill by which every man with a salary of $60 a month in gold is compelled by that bill to receive in full payment fifty-one dollars' worth of silver, or every man hired on a salary of $1,000 a year to receive in full payment eight hundred and fifty dollars' worth of silver?" "Who voted for the silver bill that compelled the farmer who had contracted to sell his wool for forty cents a pound in gold to take thirty-four cents' worth of silver for it, or his wheat at $1 a bushel in gold, to take eighty-five cents' worth of silver a bushel?" And when you have answered "I did," how many of their votes will you get? They will issue their fiat that you can hereafter stay at home.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the object, as I understand, of the establishment of a mint by the United States is to coin money. It was not contemplated that the Government should enter the bullion market, monopolize the trade, and speculate in the profits as a source of income to the Government. Its object was rather to fix the value of the standard coins and then to make the mint charges so light that it would stimulate mining industry and invite the bullion to the mint. The coinage is not for the individual but the public benefit. As soon as the coin is put in circulation the public derives the benefit of it. The Government has already fixed the quantity and the value of the silver dollar, and the question now is whether it shall demand a seigniorage or charge for coinage, or whether we shall have what is called free coinage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that it is perfectly demonstrable that neither the Government nor the people can lose one solitary cent by the free coinage of gold and silver bullion. Upon receiving this bullion at the mints the Government issues its certificates receivable for all customs dues, and when these certificates are taken up by the Government the coin made from the bullion then belongs to the Government. It is equal with the gold dollar. It pays the public debt dollar for dollar. It enters into circulation and furnishes to the people the means of paying their taxes and to the Government the means of discharging its debts and stopping interest upon them. In addition to that, it gives a currency to the people. It encourages labor. It stimulates every productive industry in this broad land. So the country is a great gainer and not a loser by free coinage.

But there is another proposition equally sound, that whenever you impose a seigniorage upon coinage the tendency is to drive bullion from the mints. The principle of this amendment, if applied to gold, would close up the mints of the United States. It amounts to nothing less than a tax of 16 per cent. upon the coinage of silver bullion. Here is what Mr. Ernest Seyd says upon this subject of the tax of ½ per cent. on gold before the Government removed it:

> The reason is perfectly obvious: the high mintage charged in the United States is tantamount to a tax on gold bullion, which effectually prevents its importation; and therein lies the whole secret of the paradox. The country which imposes a seigniorage on coin becomes a market unfavorable and closed to the importation of bullion; it cannot hold the bullion in store, and it is forced, nolens volens, to part with its coinage for what it is worth as gold bullion.

Thus it is clear that the amendment would close the mints of the United States against the coinage of silver. If the Government absorbs all the profits of mining silver it oppresses and discourages the industry and drives it from the mint. In this way the country would be a great loser. It would cut off one of its financial arms. The Government cannot pay off its enormous bullion debt in gold alone without selling more bonds and imposing a new burden of interest on the people. The duty of the Government is to take care of its standard coins in which its coin debts are payable, and let the bullion market, which is fluctuating from day to day, take care of itself.

Mr. Speaker, this discrimination in the coinage of gold and silver is only a war of the gold bullionist to drive silver from the country. The country has spoken with emphasis, and it means that the two standard coins shall march abreast. The country has taken its stand in the face of European machinations and contrivances to defeat its financial policy, and it does not intend to be deterred from pursuing that policy.

Some gentlemen pretend to be frightfully alarmed that there might be an Atlantic flood of silver bullion upon us if we coined it free except mint charges. If the amendment prevails no bullion-holder in Europe would be foolish enough to send it here to be coined to pay $16 to the Government for coining $84 for him. If the coinage should be free and foreign bullion should be brought home by our merchants in exchange for our productions and coined into standard silver dollars the country would be a great gainer, as I have already shown. We could use it in the payment of our national debt, and perhaps the most of it would return to Europe. In the last ten years we have exported gold and silver bullion and specie about $432,000,000 more than we have imported. By the time we get through paying our foreign debt the fear is that it will impoverish our mines——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EINSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I have been a patient and attentive listener to the remarks of the advocates in this House of unlimited silver coinage, and I have as yet been unable to discover from what they have said the manner or means by which the poor and laboring classes of our country are to be benefited by their bill. On the contrary, every word that has been uttered by them, every idea that has been advanced, only serves to confirm me in the opinion that the benefits of this bill would accrue solely for the profit of the large silver-mining proprietors in the country and to the bankers and brokers who, by dealing in the metal, would profit by its fluctuations.

As to the question of bimetalism which has been so cogently and fluently discoursed about in this House, and which the silver advocates have apparently settled to their entire satisfaction, my time will not permit me to discuss this branch of the question, but I do think that a subject that has so sorely puzzled and is still puzzling the wisest and ablest political economists of the world should not be as summarily settled as has been done by the champions of this bill.

The proposition to me seems to be a clear and open one. Given 412½ grains of silver, which are worth but eighty-five cents, the advocates of this wonderful bill wish to take these 412½ grains of silver and to coin, stamp, and certify them as worth $1, while in no other way would they be accepted for more than eighty-five cents; and to cap the climax of this absurdity, the profit of the transaction is not to go to the Government, in whose service they are and whose wages they receive, but they offer the 15 perany cent. gain to one, whoever he may be or wherever he may live, who is able and willing to profit by it. Why, Mr. Speaker, one familiar with the position of European governments on the silver question would almost be led to believe that this bill has been introduced into this House in the interests of those governments. Germany alone has nearly eighty millions of silver on hand which she wishes to sell. It is impossible for her to do so without greatly depressing the price. Now let this bill become a law, and what will be the consequence? This silver will all come to us, and much more besides, and we will pay a foreign government 15 per cent. premium for the privilege of affording it the opportunity of converting so much unavailable property into good American gold.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come to the gist of the whole matter, I agree fully and entirely with my distinguished friend and colleague from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] that if we are to have free coinage let us have honest weight and honest money; let every dollar be worth one hundred cents; and the justice of this is so plain and apparent to me that I have often asked myself why is it that we have this constant agitation of the silver question? Why should men stultify themselves, as do the movers of this bill? If they are honest in their convictions that it will benefit the poorer classes, why do they not demonstrate it to us? There can be but one answer to this question: it is done for political clap-trap and for no other reason, and nobody knows it better than themselves.

Mr. Speaker, the depression in business through which our country has passed is almost at an end; all signs point toward the early return of prosperity; our exports increasing immensely every year and turning the balance of trade in our favor by the hundred millions; the clank of the wheel, the sound of the forge, and the whirl of the engine are again heard throughout the land; the trials and tribulations of the past eighteen years are almost at an end. What our country needs is rest; we are giving it nothing but the direst commotion. Let us change all this. Let us give the people laws founded in truth, honesty, and fair-dealing, and then with the blessing of Providence upon us we can go forth serenely upon our mission, making our land a land of happiness for those who dwell therein and a haven of rest for the afflicted and oppressed of all nations.

Mr. REAGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. WARNER. I give notice that when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has spoken I shall call the previous question on this amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire merely to call attention for one moment to the theory and effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. The theory of the bill presented from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is that by the free coinage of silver and by making silver coin receivable for all public dues and for all private indebtedness we shall make it equal in value to gold and legal-tender notes. Will not this be the effect? On the very day that we authorize the free coinage of silver as provided for in this bill and make silver coin receivable for every purpose for which gold coin and legal-tender notes are now receivable, do we not make all these three forms of currency equal in value? That is the theory of the bill.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois contemplates that the Government shall purchase silver bullion at its bullion price and coin it into money—in his speech he said at its present bullion price, but certainly he did not mean that, because he did not contemplate, I presume, that silver was always to remain 15 per cent. below par as compared with gold. But, sir, if the theory of the bill is correct, if this measure will have the effect, as its friends believe, of equalizing the silver coin of the country with its gold coin and its legal-tender notes, where is the utility of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois? What office can it perform? Its practical effect has been pointed out by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.] It would be an insidious mode of defeating the very object of this bill and preventing relief to the people of this country from a part of the burdens which are imposed upon them because of the want of sufficient circulating medium. No more insidious or dangerous blow could be struck at this bill than this by the gentleman from Illinois, who professes to be a friend of the bill. I do not doubt his profession is sincere, and my only desire is to call his attention to the fact that he proceeds on the theory that, when we have made silver receivable like gold and legal-tender notes for all public and private indebtedness and all public dues, it will still remain 15 per cent. below par with gold and give the Government that margin of profit in purchasing it. I suggest that it is illogical; that it cannot be true such would be the condition of things; and that there is no place in the policy of this bill for the office of that amendment.

If it be said that the present bullion would be enhanced in price by the passage of the act, who is hurt by it? Is any one? If it benefit any it will at the same time benefit all; and as it was by the legislation of Congress silver was degraded, I desire it brought back to its monetary system in this country over the same track, that it shall be made good by law as it was formerly degraded by law. [Applause.]

Mr. WARNER. I now demand the previous question on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, and I desire to be heard on the pending question.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not demand the previous question, and for this reason, that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has been under discussion for some time.

The SPEAKER. After the disposition of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois it will be again under discussion.

Mr. BAYNE. But it will interrupt the course of the discussion and interrupt perhaps some remarks which might be made pertinent to those which have been made heretofore.

The SPEAKER. The effect will be only to clear out of the way, by its rejection or adoption, the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado. The demand for the previous question only applies to that amendment.

Mr. CONGER. It will open the way then for another amendment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. Then I do not see what the gentleman gains.

The SPEAKER. It is not for the Chair to consider what the gentleman loses or gains, but he supposes his object is to get that amendment out of the way at this time.

Mr. WARNER. I only desire a vote on that amendment, as the Chair suggests. It does not cut off further debate or amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. It will not preclude the introduction of another amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is so.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his demand, as I suppose his object is to get action upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois next.

Mr. GARFIELD. This demand for the previous question covers only the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado?

The SPEAKER. That is all.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. BELFORD'S amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 90.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARNER. Why we had the yeas and nays on this very question yesterday.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to know who favors American industry.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the yeas and nays will not be ordered as we have already had them on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 88, nays 120, not voting 77; as follows:

Mr. EWING. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

The Clerk read as follows;

Strike out all after the word "law" in line 14 and insert the following:

"He shall issue and deliver to the depositor of such bullion certificates in denominations, at the option of the depositor, corresponding with the denominations of the United States legal-tender notes, to an amount equal to the value of such bullion, which amount shall be determined by the average market price of silver bullion in the cities of New York and San Francisco during the week preceding such deposit. The standard dollars coined from such bullion shall, to the extent of 40 per cent. of the aggregate amount of the certificates so issued, be held for the redemption thereof, and the remainder of such dollars shall be applied to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt. The certificates so issued shall be received at par for all dues to the United States and in payment of the current expenses of the Government, and shall be redeemable in standard silver dollars. Any silver dollars now or hereafter in the Treasury may be used in redemption of such certificates."

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask the attention of the House for the purpose of observing what this bill provides in its present shape as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] and by my colleague, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, all men admit when they get down to talking sense that whenever you get enough silver to answer the purposes of metal money in this country—the disproportion in value of silver to gold at the present ratio remaining—that silver would drive gold out. I want to say here and now, for one, that while I would gladly see both circulate, and I hope the time will come when they will equal each other in value at the present ratio of 16 to 1, yet I can conceive of greater disasters happening to the country than to see gold go out of circulation and silver come in its place; but I say here that until an amount of silver is coined necessary for a metal money by itself, although intrinsically the silver dollar is less valuable than the gold dollar, it will continue to circulate at par with gold, and that whenever there is enough to answer the purposes of money then gold will go out of circulation. But from this time up to the time when silver drives gold out, either the Government or the holder of the silver bullion is going to make the profit on the coinage of silver.

Now, I say that this bill as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] will not give us silver money more rapidly without my colleague's [Mr. SPRINGER'S] amendment than with it. My colleague's amendment proposes that when bullion is deposited in the Mint and silver certificates shall be issued therefor they shall be issued for the market value of the bullion and shall be redeemed in standard silver dollars. To illustrate: under my colleague's amendment, at the present price of silver as compared with gold, a man takes 460 grains of silver to the Mint, which is worth $1 in the market before it is coined, and the Government takes it and coins 412½ grains of it into a dollar and gives it in exchange for the 460 grains, and the balance goes into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of everybody. Under the bill without my colleague's amendment the same man would depost his 460 grains of silver at the Mint, the Government would coin 412½ grains of it into a dollar, give it to him, and return the balance of the 460 grains or its equivalent to him. In each case a dollar is made for circulation, and in the one case the Government gets the overplus, called seigniorage, and in the other case the depositor gets it.

I think the Government should have it and not the depositor, therefore I am for my colleague's amendment. Coinage would be no more rapid in one case than the other. If gentlemen fear that bullion would not be deposited, we can in that event let the present law be executed, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to buy not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 monthly of silver bullion and coin it into dollars. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] is to another section not now under consideration. It provides for the deposit of bullion in the Treasury at the market price, and the issuing of certificates therefor. In that transaction the profit goes to the Government. Why not let the same provision apply when the bullion is deposited at the Mint, as my colleague's amendment provides?

We have capacity at the mints to coin about four million silver dollars per month, and it will take from two to four years to coin sufficient, added to the $30,000,000 now coined, if you run the mints to their full capacity, to get sufficient silver money to answer the purpose of a metallic currency, to the exclusion of the gold; and during all this time I am in favor of the Government taking the profit upon the coinage rather than the bullion-owner.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a remark?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will if my time can be extended another minute.

Mr. BUCKNER. My amendment applies only to the issue of certificates. The coinage goes on. But the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] stops the coinage.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman proposes by his amendment that if I have got an ounce of silver I can take it and get a silver certificate, and my certificate is given at the market price for the silver. In other words, the 15 per cent. goes to the Government. But he insists the law shall be that if I take it to the mint at Philadelphia then I shall have 15 per cent. more for it than I would if I deposit in the Treasury.

Mr. BUCKNER. My amendment does not give any encouragement to the issue of certificates at all.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. But why do you want to give this profit to the man who deposits the bullion at the mint, when the capacity of the mint is limited and the Government might as well buy it for what it is worth?

Is the silver dollar in the hands of the man who toils for his daily bread any better when the bullion-holder has made the profit of ten or fifteen cents on it than it would be if the Government had made that profit? The dollar is the same to him.

As I was interrupted, I ask to be indulged for a minute or two longer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not stop the gentleman unless some member objects.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will only delay the House a minute.

I have heard during the discussion upon this bill much said about making money cheaper and about dishonest money. Now, I have no sympathy with the proposition that we should make money out of nothing and make lots of it; nor have I any sympathy with the proposition that we should make money dear either by contracting its amount or adopting the single standard. The truth is, every dollar we owe is payable under the contract in standard silver dollars or gold, at our option; and we have a perfect right, both legal and moral, to use the cheapest.

So when the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] and others who agree with him on both sides of the House, talk about the 412½-grain silver dollar being dishonest, or that its weight should be increased, they forsake the broad highway marked out by the contract, in which both debtor and creditor have a right to travel, and go off into the by-paths that lead to oppression and disaster, furnishing a precedent for fiatists, who believe that dollars can be paid in mere pieces of paper that either contain no promise or will never know a redeemer, to journey in the by-paths that lead in an opposite direction, to repudiation and dishonor. The best way is to travel upon the highway marked out by the contract.

Begging pardon for this digression, I want to say in conclusion again that I trust my colleague's amendment will be adopted, for it is drawn with care, and is just and equitable in its provisions.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. Without intending to impugn the motives of any gentleman who favors this measure, I must characterize the bill as presented from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures as a sheer, unmitigated fraud upon the people of the United States, intended not to serve the best interests of any class of the people of this country, unless it be the holders and producers of bullion.

The bill has two principal objects in view. One is to remove all restrictions upon the coinage of silver. The other is to issue certificates upon silver bullion deposited in the mint in order to inflate the currency of the country. The second proposition by confession admits the fact that silver does not circulate as a currency, and it therefore resorts to this method of creating a circulating medium, intended to take the place of that medium which will not circulate.

The other proposition will have but one effect. If silver dollars are coined to an unlimited amount it will have the simple effect of driving out of this country all the gold coin that is now in it. That is an axiom of political economy. That is the law announced by Sir Thomas Gresham three hundred years ago, when he stated as a proposition of political economy that bad money would always drive out good money, and that good money would never drive out bad money. The effect of this bill, if this inferior currency is coined, worth now sixteen cents less on the dollar than is a gold dollar, will be to drive out of the country honest gold currency and substitute what? Not silver, because by the admission of the bill itself silver will not circulate; but silver certificates to be issued by the Government and to take the place of the present circulating medium of the country. Now, is that good policy? Is it wisdom? This bill will be improved very considerably by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] because it proposes to give to the Government the profit to be made on this silver coinage. But free coinage of silver can never be successfully inaugurated in this country, unless the civilized nations of the world will come in and participate in a system of free coinage of silver.

I care not if you put 480 grains of silver into a silver dollar; I venture the prediction that unless England, Germany, and the Latin union, and the other nations which have either wholly or partially demonetized silver, will join with us in making it a circulating medium, the ratio of difference between the two metals will constantly increase. I make the prediction that unless these nations be joined with us in making silver a currency, instead of the ratio between silver and gold being 15 or 16 to 1, it will soon be 20 to 1. Why, sir, the object of the bill was stated to be to elevate the silver dollar to an equality with gold. What has been the effect thus far? Thirty million dollars of silver have been coined. When we began coining it there was only five cents difference in value between the gold dollar and the silver dollar. Now the difference is sixteen cents. Thus it is a matter of actual experience that the coinage of silver into dollars will not enhance the value of the bullion; on the contrary, in the face of such coinage, the value of bullion has constantly diminished.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allowed me I shall not attempt to go over the whole subject. To make by arbitrary law a change in the standard of value, that which measures the products of labor, is a dangerous thing to do. In 1792 this Government authorized the coinage of the silver dollar containing 371¼ grains of pure silver. That is the amount of pure silver in the silver dollar to-day. This silver dollar was not only made a legal tender, but it was made the standard and unit of value, to which the amount of bullion in the gold coin has been adjusted from time to time. Now, the great mass of indebtedness in this country, national, State, municipal, and private, was contracted prior to 1873, at a time when the dollar containing 371¼ grains of pure silver was the standard and unit of value and a legal tender. The proposition made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] to increase this silver dollar to 460 grains was, in my opinion, a proposition to rob the debtor classes of this country. It was as unjustifiable and unjust as it would be to increase the yard-stick from three feet to four feet in length and require that contracts made prior to the increase should be fulfilled according to this new standard of measurement.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this silver dollar having been created as the standard and unit of value, there is no propriety, there is manifest injustice in adopting another which is either more or less valuable. It is no more just to increase the standard of value than it is to decrease it. I stand to-day by the silver dollar as the unit and standard of value. If I could have my way in this House I would adjust the unit of bullion in the gold coin in the future as we have done in the past to that standard of value.

Mr. Speaker, when we depart from this standard of value we set ourselves afloat upon a great sea and our ultimate destination no man can tell. If you adopt the principle that you have the right to increase the standard of value and thereby affect past contracts, you might as well assert the right to increase the measure of weights or to increase the length of the yard-stick and apply this increased standard to contracts already made.

But some gentlemen say that the silver dollar is not a dollar of full value, that it is only worth eighty-four cents, while the gold dollar is worth one hundred cents. Now I reply that the silver dollar is the unit or standard of value and that if this difference in the value of the two coins exists, then the gold dollar is worth one hundred and fifteen cents and the silver dollar one hundred cents. [Laughter and applause.]

But gentlemen say that if we re-enact the law making the silver dollar the standard, we thereby destroy the credit of this country. Where is the foundation for any such assertion? Upon the back of your national bonds is printed the distinct declaration that the bond is payable in coin of the standard weight and measure as existing in 1870. In addition to this, during the Forty-fifth Congress both Houses adopted by overwhelming majorities a resolution (and I am afraid some of my friends on this side of the House are forgetting how they voted upon that resolution) declaring that this Government has the right to pay its indebtedness in standard silver dollars or the equivalent thereof. In the face of the law providing that the bonds of the Government should be paid in coin of the standard weight and fineness as existing in 1870, and in the face of the resolution to which I have just referred adopted by the Forty-fifth Congress, the credit of this Government has never been better. For the last six months men with large means and men with small means have been flocking to the depositaries of the Government to invest their means in 4 per cent. securities.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARSH. I would like to have at least two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask consent of the House. Is there objection to the gentleman continuing his remarks for two minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSH. I shall now address myself to the third section of this bill as reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Mr. Speaker, the demonetization of the silver dollar was in my opinion a crime, a fraud upon the people of this country. I do not propose to reflect upon gentlemen who took part in that action; I speak of the thing itself. Now, is it possible that we cannot legislate upon the subject of silver without committing another fraud? Yet I say that the third section of this bill as reported by the committee would, if enacted by us, be a fraud upon the people of this country, [applause,] because it gives to the bullion-holder the opportunity to make 17 per cent. off of the people of this country by this coinage. [Renewed applause.] Sir, if party considerations were paramount with me on this floor, I would like to see the democratic party go before the people in 1880 in advocacy of the principle contained in the third section; for the people of this country by their votes would bury them so deep that the horn of Gabriel would not resurrect them. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, the amendment of my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] removes the objection to this third section. It gives to the Treasury of this country the difference between the value of the bullion and the par value of the dollar. In giving this difference to the Treasury, it gives it to the people of this country. It is in their interest.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we have probably never legislated on any question the influence of which reaches further, both territorially and in time, and touches more interests, more vital interests, than are touched by this and similar bills. No man can doubt that within recent years, and notably within recent months, the leading thinkers of the civilized world have become alarmed at the attitude of the two precious metals in relation to each other, and many leading thinkers are becoming clearly of the opinion that by some wise, broad, judicious arrangement both the precious metals must be kept in service for the currency of the world. And this opinion has been very rapidly gaining ground within the last six months, even to the extent that England, which for more than half a century has stoutly adhered to the single gold standard, is now seriously meditating how she may harness both these metals to the monetary car of the world. And yet, outside of this Capitol, I do not this day know of a single great and recognized advocate of bimetallic money who regards it prudent or safe for any nation largely to increase the coinage standard of silver coin at the present time beyond the limits fixed by existing laws. France and the states of the Latin union, that have long believed in bimetallism, maintained it against all comers and have done all in their power to advocate it throughout the world, dare not coin a single silver coin and have not done so since 1874. The most strenuous advocates of bimetallism in those countries say it would be ruinous to bimetalism for France or the Latin union to coin any more silver at present. The remaining stock of German silver now for sale, amounting to from forty to seventy-five millions of dollars, is a standing menace to the exchanges and silver coinage of Europe. One month ago the leading financial journal of London proposed that the Bank of England buy one-half of the German surplus and hold it five years on condition that the German Government shall hold the other half off the market. The time is ripe for some wise and prudent arrangement among the nations to save silver from a disastrous break-down.

Yet we, who during the past two years have coined far more silver dollars than we ever before coined since the foundation of the Government—ten times as much as we coined during half a century of our national life—are to-day ignoring and defying the enlightened, universal opinion of bimetallists, and saying that the United States singlehanded and alone can enter the field and settle the mighty issue alone. We are justifying the old proverb that "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

It is sheer madness, Mr. Speaker. I once saw a dog on a great stack of hay that had been floated out into the wild, overflowed stream of a river, with its stack-pen and foundation still holding together, but ready to be wrecked. For a little while the animal appeared to be perfectly happy. His haystack was there and the pen around it, and he seemed to think the world was bright and his happiness secure while the sunshine fell softly on his head and his hay. But by and by he began to discover that the house and the barn and their surroundings were not all there as they were when he went to sleep the night before, and he began to see that he could not command all the prospect and peacefully dominate the scene as he had done before. So with this House. We assume to manage this mighty question which has been launched on the wild current that sweeps over the whole world, and we bark from our legislative hay-stacks as though we commanded the whole world. [Applause.] In the name of common sense and sanity, let us take some account of the flood; let us understand that a deluge means something, and try, if we can, to get our bearings before we undertake to settle the affairs of all mankind by a vote in this House of Representatives.

To-day we are coining one-third of all the silver of all kinds that is being coined in the round world, China is coining another third, and all other nations are using the other one-third for subsidiary coin. And if we want to take rank with China and part company with all of the civilized nations of the western world, we can by passing this bill, and bay the moon as we float down the whirling channel to take our place among the Asiatic silver monometalists.

Now, what this country needs above all other things is that this Congress shall pass the appropriation bills, adjourn, and go home, [applause on the republican side,] and let the forces of business and good order and brotherhood, working in their natural and orderly way, bring us into light and stability and peace. And we want time to adjust this great international question. Now, while I am speaking, the Administration is opening a negotiation with all the western nations to see if there cannot be some international arrangement whereby this question of bimetalism may be wisely settled. We tried it by international monetary conference. It was a preliminary reconnaissance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the House would allow me a few minutes longer—— [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. COFFROTH. How much time?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes under the rule. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. We tried an international monetary conference and made a beginning——

Mr. COFFROTH. I have objected.

Mr. MILLS. Did the gentleman make the objection in time?

Mr. COFFROTH. I did.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always takes the statement of a gentleman.

Mr. COBB. He did make it in time.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I am glad, indeed, that the present Administration has been induced by the action taken in this House to consider this great question and to open correspondence with other countries on the subject, and I hope the Administration will be induced by the vote of this House on this bill to continue the consideration of the subject. I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a letter from Hon. Mr. Groesbeck, who represented the United States as one of its commissioners at the late monetary conference at Paris. I do not know that I am quite authorized to make it public, but I will venture to read a paragraph from it.

My distinguished colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] who has just taken his seat thinks there is no bimetallist outside of this House who favors independent action by the United States. But I think he could point to no one who has more thoroughly and ably treated this subject or who better understands it than the distinguished representative of the United States at the late Paris conference whose words I quote. He says:

> I agree in what you say of the importance of the United States in determining the status of silver, and I regret that our power in this problem is not more fully appreciated.
> It is not a pleasant idea that we must look to other nations to fix for us our monetary system, or that we must change it from time to time at their dictation, and as they see fit to change theirs. If it be possible we should move to a position of independence, if not of control.

But I rose, Mr. Speaker, to speak to another point, and not to answer now my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The opinion seems to prevail very generally in this House that if this bill passes it will give to the owner of silver bullion a profit of 15 per cent. on all the bullion he takes to the mint. Now, the absurdity of that proposition is so plain that I wonder how so many have fallen into the fallacy and have become bewildered upon the simple question of coinage. Take for illustration gold. The metal gold is set apart from all other things, and by the common consent of mankind, and by the laws of different countries, is constituted, so to speak, a money substance. The metal itself is endowed with the money quality. The money function is in the metal as well before coining as after. Coining is the mere certification of weight and fineness, and does not alter its value. A hundred onces of gold in the form of bullion have the same value exactly when coinage is free as a hundred ounces of gold coin.

This does not conflict with the fact that the value of gold is due largely to its monetary use. Now, what is true of gold was true of silver before the law of 1873. Silver was a money metal set apart the same as gold. The money function belonged to and inhered in the metal; silver coins had no more value than the same weight of silver bullion had. A hundred ounces of silver bullion possessed precisely the same value in the market, would exchange for just as much of anything as a hundred ounces of silver coins would. In short, if it costs nothing to change the form of silver from bullion to coins, and there is no limitation to the appropriation of silver to coinage purposes, then it is impossible that there should be any difference in value between the same weight of silver bullion and silver coins. That was the status of silver in the United States from the foundation of the Government down to 1873, and if this bill becomes a law that will be exactly its status again. Then, whatever value a given weight of metal may have, that value the same weight of coins will have, and no more. How, then, I ask, will the coining of silver bullion give the owner a profit of 15 per cent. unless, by the full remonetization of silver, the value of all silver metal is raised 15 per cent., which all gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have argued would not be the case? Where is the 15 per cent. to come from then?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER. I would like to explain this point a little further.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's time being extended.

Objection was made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentlemen on this side will not insist on the objection.

Mr. WARNER. If objection is made to proceeding now I shall occupy a portion of the time allowed me for closing the debate in clearing up this mystery.

Mr. HASKELL. It is not necessary for me to announce to this House, when so large a number of its members were members of the Forty-fifth Congress, that I have ever been an enthusiastic bimetalist and in favor of reaching just as soon as possible a free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver upon precisely the same terms. I hold the same opinion now that I held then, and I have seen reasons to strengthen the position rather than any cause for departing from the position I occupied one year ago. I am opposed, however, to this bill reported from the committee at this time, and I am opposed also to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] I am opposed to this amendment, because I believe it repeals the present law and gives us one in lieu of it under which not a million dollars a year of coin could be issued, or of certificates either. But the features of this bill as introduced from the committee, pure and simple, are worse even than that. It assumes, by the statement of the gentleman who brought it upon this floor, that the United States, in and of its own power, can accomplish that or can restore that which it took five or six nations to bring down, with an increase of the bullion product of the world beside. Demonetization by Germany, demonetization by Scandinavia, the restriction by the Latin union, the increase of the world's product, and the demonetization by the United States, all this was what put silver down to eighty-three cents. Now it is proposed that we shall step in and say we will restore it to par by our own unaided action. Absolutely impossible! If we do not restore it to par what is the result? Why, just as soon as the certificates can be issued the gold in this country must leave, in obedience to that inexorable law which has never been contradicted in the known world; never. If gold leaves this country under an unlimited issue of silver certificates and of silver coin combined, we shall have then in this country a contraction of legal-tender debt-paying coin of over $200,000,000. And here we stand to-day facing these great problems, facing the certainty of a two-hundred-million legal-tender coin contraction, facing the absolute certainty of a withdrawal of coin deposits in the Treasury of the United States, and we risk the whole scheme upon our judgment that this bill will bring back the bullion price of silver from eighty-three cents to one hundred cents. For myself, I dare not risk it. For myself, I prefer that the law should remain as it is.

Now take this bullion-certificate feature—if the Chair will allow me a moment—take this bullion-certificate feature and follow it out to its logical conclusion. What do you do? You offer 15 per cent. premium to the bullion-holders of the world to come in and get certificates. You can probably secure a deposit of two or three hundred millions of bullion in a year. You cannot coin more than fifty millions of this bullion into legal-tender coins; but you provide that shall be received by the Government in payment of dues. It goes into the Treasury of the United States. It is not there subject to the appropriations of Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HASKELL. I would like a little time to complete my sentence.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. If the Chair recognizes me I will yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. WARNER. I object.

Mr. EWING. Mr. Speaker, the great apparent object of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is to save to the Government the difference between the coin value and the bullion value of silver, which difference the gentleman assumes will continue to exist after this bill is passed. But the effect of his amendment, if adopted, will be that while repealing, as it will repeal, the existing law, making peremptory the coinage of two millions of dollars' worth of silver bullion per month, his amendment will commit to the Secretary of the Treasury the entire power, at his discretion and subject to his will alone, of entirely stopping the coinage of silver. It says that he shall buy bullion at "the market price." The market price where? In London? In San Francisco? In New York? In Virginia City? In Denver? The amendment does not say where. He has the right to fix where, and he, being thoroughly and intensely inimical to the coinage of one silver dollar, would no doubt so construe the law and exercise his power that hardly any holders of silver bullion will sell at the market price as declared by him.

How will he ascertain the market price? Most likely by calling for bids. He may take the lowest bid he gets and fix that as the price, and that will very likely be so low that only the lowest out of a hundred bidders would be willing to sell, and the other ninety-nine would send their bullion to a market where they can get a better price for export to Europe or Asia. Hence I fear the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will result, if adopted, not only in defeating the whole purpose of this bill but also in depriving us of the coinage of silver now secured by existing law.

The amendment which I propose to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois meets the object which he seems to have in view, by providing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay for all bullion offered at the mints the average market price at New York and San Francisco for the week preceding the day when the bullion is offered. Under my amendment, when bullion is offered, the Secretary will be bound to pay for it in certificates at a price not fixed by himself, not the minimum price in the whole world, but the average market value in the two great American cities where silver bullion is daily bought and sold.

Another object of my amendment. It is assumed, and experience has so far sustained the assumption, that 40 per cent. of gold coin in the Treasury is sufficient to secure the redemption of the greenbacks; and I provide in my amendment, therefore, that 40 per cent. of the silver dollars coined from bullion purchased with silver certificates shall be held in the Treasury for the redemption of such certificates. My amendment provides further, that the other 60 per cent. of the silver dollars coined from the bullion bought shall be expended in extinguishment of the national debt.

The Secretary of the Treasury has said over and over again that he will not buy more gold coin, because 40 per cent. in gold of the amount of the greenback circulation is an ample fund for its redemption and any further purchase of gold for that purpose would be a useless burden on the people. Now, if that per cent. in gold dollars, which are peculiarly subject to the danger of withdrawal either for hoarding at home or shipment abroad, is ample to secure the redemption of greenbacks in gold, why is not an equal per cent. in silver dollars, which are not at all likely to be called for, an ample redemption fund for silver certificates? And if it is ample what is the use or sense of keeping silver coin in the Treasury to the whole amount of certificates outstanding, as provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois? Why not take 60 per cent. of the silver coin for which there is and can be no possible use in the Treasury and expend it in paying off bonds and lightening the burden of annual interest? I therefore appeal to the gentleman from Illinois and the republican side of this House who are so zealous for the interests of the people to support my amendment, which goes so much further in securing the interests of the people than his amendment goes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER. I demand the previous question upon this section and the pending amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I should have the right to close the debate on my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded upon the section and the pending amendments.

Mr. CONGER. There are other amendments which gentlemen desire to offer.

Mr. FORT. Did not the gentleman agree to yield to me to offer another amendment?

Mr. CONGER. The previous question can be called on the pending amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I insist upon the previous question. We have debated this bill until we are all getting tired; at least so I am told by gentlemen on the republican side of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to accept as a part of my amendment that portion of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] with regard to the determination of the market price of silver.

Mr. WARNER. I must object.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to harmonize as far as possible the objections which have been made to my amendment, and therefore I will insert after the word "deposited," in the fifteenth line, the words:

And the market value of bullion shall be determined by the average market price of silver bullion in the cities of New York and San Francisco during the week preceding such deposit.

Mr. WARNER. I raise the point of order on that amendment that it is an amendment to an amendment to an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is a modification of an amendment made by the gentleman who offered it; and the Chair allows it to be offered.

Mr. FORT. I wish to submit to the gentleman whether he will permit another amendment to be offered, as he agreed to do?

Mr. WARNER. When was that?

Mr. FORT. I desire to submit an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The remedy of the gentleman is to join with those who desire to vote down the previous question; that is his only remedy.

Mr. FORT. Several amendments have been offered to-day.

The SPEAKER. And accepted as modifications.

Mr. FORT. I wish to submit to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] whether he will withdraw his agreement with me to let my amendment come in?

Mr. WARNER. When was that?

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question upon the third section of the bill and the two amendments pending thereto.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 94, noes 69.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. WARNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. EWING to the amendment of Mr. SPRINGER, to strike out of the amendment of Mr. SPRINGER all after the word "law," in line 14, and insert the following:

He shall issue and deliver to the depositor of such bullion certificates, in denominations at the option of the depositor, corresponding with the denominations of United States legal-tender notes, to an amount equal to the value of such bullion, which amount shall be determined by the average market price of silver bullion in the cities of New York and San Francisco during the week preceding such deposit. The standard dollars coined from such bullion shall, to the extent of 40 per cent. of the aggregate amount of the certificate so issued, be held for the redemption thereof; and the remainder of such dollars shall be applied to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt. The certificates so issued shall be received at par for all dues to the United States and in payment of the current expenses of the Government, and shall be redeemable in standard silver dollars. Any silver dollars now or hereafter in the Treasury may be used in redemption of such certificates.

Mr. CONGER. Is that amendment divisible?

The CHAIR. Will the gentleman indicate in what way it is divisible?

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have a separate vote on that portion of the amendment which provides that all over 40 per cent. of the silver dollars coined under this bill shall be used in paying the interest and principal of the public debt.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. While the Chair is examining the amendment and determining the question of divisibility I move that the House now adjourn. I know that my colleague [Mr. WARNER] needs rest. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. I can stand it for some time yet.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 80, noes 96.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have read a paragragh from the Manual upon the divisibility of propositions.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw my request for a division of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Then the question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. EWING. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 105, not voting 75; as follows:

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 19, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

COLLECTION OF DIRECT TAXES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, with a report from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The communication of the Secretary will be read.

The communication was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 16, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Senate, adopted May 1, 1879, in the words following:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate of the amounts due and uncollected, if any, under section 8, act of August 5, 1861, entitled 'An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' and to state the reasons, if any exist, why the same have not been collected or should not now be collected agreeably to the provisions of said act."

In reference thereto I beg to submit a copy of a report under date of the 14th instant from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in which detailed statements in regard to the collection of direct taxes under section 8 of the act of August 5, 1861, will be found, as well as suggestions in regard to their further collection.

There can be no doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury is charged with the duty of collecting this direct tax under the provisions of existing laws. To leave them uncollected will be an unconstitutional and inequitable discrimination against those States which have paid their respective quotas of the tax under the statute of 1861 and other acts.

The last legal suspension of the collection expired January 1, 1879. It remains for Congress to decide whether the collection shall proceed under the methods provided by existing statutes, or whether additional legislation is necessary. The protracted suspension only renders the final collection of the tax more difficult and uncertain, and if further legislation be necessary, it should be immediate.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. WILLAM A. WHEELER,
President of the Senate.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, as this communication is in response to a resolution which I had the honor to present to the Senate, it may be proper that I should explain briefly the purposes which I had in view in offering it.

It will be recollected probably by all that the original tax, which was laid upon all the States and the Territories of the United States in 1861, was to the amount of $20,000,000, and that there remains—although I believe the figures have not been read to the Senate—at the present time the sum of more than $3,000,000 still uncollected and due to the United States from a portion of the States and Territories.

It appears also that a small portion of that sum—I think about one-sixth part—has been due for a period of some seventeen or eighteen years, while the remaining five-sixths have been due and unpaid for more than ten years.

It is very clear that it is quite time to take some steps in regard to the collection, if it may be collected, of the remainder which is still unsatisfied of this tax. It is neither just to the United States nor to the States which are delinquent that it should stand longer in the way it does. In some manner the books of the United States should be balanced. If there is any ground upon which or any reason why any portion of this tax should be remitted, that disposition should be made of it without further delay; but I presume there is no pretense of that sort. Indeed I suppose there is no one of the States which would ask to have the balance outstanding against it remitted.

The first consideration which I suppose would address itself to the committee to which this subject shall be referred is that which is suggested in the report itself,—the adoption of such legislative provisions as will enable the balances due to be certainly and speedily recovered. But there is another consideration also which should engage the attention of the committee, as I think. Pending the collection of the balances due, it is very likely that there may be found claims and there may be appropriations upon those claims in favor of some of the States which are in default with their proportion of this tax. If that should occur, it certainly would be reasonable that, if the law justifies it, there should be a set-off of such claims. I understand that one or two such instances have arisen already, that appropriations have been made in favor of one or more of the delinquent States, and the question has been raised in those cases whether the amount should be paid to the State without considering the counter claim of the United States, and the decision of the Treasury Department has been in favor of that course. But it was against the opinion of some very eminent lawyers, as I am informed, and the language of the statute, I understand, would justify a different view of that subject. It seems very proper at least that the committee should consider this subject so that if, in the future, any claim should arise from any of these States against the United States, the set-off of those mutual demands should be effected if possible.

The sum involved here, Mr. President, is really a very considerable one, although we have been in the habit of dealing in large figures of late years. Three million was, if I recollect aright, very nearly the amount of the total expenditures of this Government in the early years of the Republic. If it may be done, and I see no reason why it may not be done, I think it should be provided that a speedy and effectual method of recovering the claim should be devised by the committee and adopted, in order that this sum shall be gathered into the Treasury and applied to the purposes for which it was originally designed. It will go so far toward relieving the country from the burdens of taxation of which we have so often heard on this floor.

I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COIN RESERVE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 17, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant in words as follows, namely:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amount of the legal-tender notes of the United States have been presented and redeemed in coin since January 1, 1879; and, also, what amount of coin he considers himself authorized to retain in the Treasury for the purpose of maintaining resumption of specie payments under the provisions of the act of January 14, 1875."

In reply I have to state that there has been redeemed in coin since January 1, 1879, of legal-tender notes an amount of $4,133,513. As to the amount of coin authorized to be retained in the Treasury for the purpose of maintaining resumption of specie payments, I have to state that under the provisions of the resumption act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to prepare and provide for the redemption of United States notes, to use any surplus revenue in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue certain bonds of the United States, the coin reserve of the Treasury has been increased to $138,000,000, that being about 40 per cent. of the notes outstanding to be redeemed, and believed to be the smallest reserve upon which resumption could be prudently commenced and successfully maintained, as fully set forth in my last annual report. This reserve arose from the sale of $95,500,000 bonds and from surplus revenues as authorized by law, and it must under existing law be maintained unimpaired for the purpose for which it was created.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER,
President of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Finance if there be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. The communication is in response to a resolution that I offered. I move that it lie upon the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

AUTOMATIC SIGNAL TELEGRAPH SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the report of the commission appointed under the provisions of the act of Congress approved December 13, 1878, to examine such automatic signal telegraph systems as may be submitted to them by the owners and agents thereof, and to ascertain which of the same is best adapted for the purpose of the earliest and most certain transmission by signal of the occurrence of fire, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of John Wilhelm, late a private in Company E, Eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the correction of his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present the petition of A. Y. P. Garnett and Philip McAleer, and ask that it may be read for information and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists respectfully represent that they have discovered a method by which the frauds annually perpetrated upon the revenues of the Government by the improper use of the revenue-stamps upon cigar-boxes can be effectually prevented.

Wherefore your memorialists pray that the appropriate committee of the Senate be directed to inquire into and report upon the merits of said invention.

Mr. DAWES presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Boston against the extension of the McKay & Mathies patent for an improvement in the sewing-machine; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

WASHINGTON CITY POST-OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) authorizing the appointment of a commission to lease a building for a city post-office in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and I ask for its present consideration in view of the emergency which seems to exist according to the statement of the Postmaster-General.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which proposes to constitute the Postmaster-General and the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds a commission with authority to lease such building in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, for the purpose of a city post-office as in their judgment the good of the public service may require. The lease is to be for a term of not less than three nor exceeding five years, and at an annual rental not to exceed $5,000 per annum.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not rise to object to the joint resolution, but to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice that the joint resolution authorizes the rental of a building but makes no appropriation for the payment of the rent. I ask the chairman how he expects the rental to be paid, in what way, and whether that ought not to be provided for in this same joint resolution?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The joint resolution came from the House, having passed that body in its present shape. I imagine that the payment of the rental will be a matter for subsequent consideration.

I think myself it would be well to provide by an appropriation for the payment of the rent, but merely the authority is asked to lease a suitable building. I do not know whether the Postmaster-General has any authority to expend money for this purpose. In his letter of April 22 he says:

On the 15th day of January of the present year I had the honor of addressing a communication to you directing the attention of Congress to the following extract from my report to the President for the year ended June 30, 1878:

* * * * * * *

"I also respectfully urge that some suitable building be provided for the Washington City office.

"It now occupies so large a portion of the departmental building as to leave insufficient room for the clerks of the Department, and renders the space available for files and records entirely inadequate. For want of other suitable room, many tons of valuable records are now stored in the attic of the building, adding greatly to the danger from fire, in the event of which their destruction would be inevitable."

The Forty-fifth Congress having adjourned without conferring any authority to act in this matter, while the daily increased necessity for such action is being realized by the Department, I desire again to call the attention of Congress to the subject.

The law authorizes the Postmaster-General to lease buildings for post-office purposes in cities where the Government buildings have not been erected for that purpose, but in this instance the original design of the Post-Office Department building contemplated the use of a portion of it for the city post-office, and I doubt my authority to move the city office to another place without the sanction of Congress. In addition an act of Congress prohibits officers of the Government from leasing any buildings except where appropriations have first been made for the payment of rent.

It is absolutely necessary, and at this time, that some provision be made for a city post-office, and I respectfully suggest that immediate action be taken to either lease or purchase a suitable property.

I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that we supposed this matter had been considered in the House of Representatives. At any rate, that is the body which usually sends us appropriations, and therefore we have a right to suppose that the form of the joint resolution is satisfactory. I ask that the joint resolution be passed in its present shape, and if an appropriation is necessary that can be made hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know why this matter cannot wait until the regular session. We have got along with the post-office as it is for a considerable period of time. This session was not called on account of any great emergency in respect of a city post-office in this town, but for a supposed other emergency; and I think that a matter of this kind ought to wait until the regular session, just as much as all the other objects of legislation which I believe the Senate has been generally disposed to have wait until the regular time.

There is another thing I should like to say,—I do not suppose it will do any good—and that is, that the experience of this Government in leasing buildings in this town for public uses has not been a fortunate one; and I think, speaking for myself, that the Post-Office Department and every other Department ought to get on with what it has until on the vacant land that the United States has in this town proper public buildings can be built, or some land bought if there is not any that we now own in the proper place for a post-office, if it be necessary. When we begin to lease, it has been found by previous experience, (that we had to correct by very sharp legislation,) we begin to go astray through the inevitable tendency of leasing operations in this town.

I should hope for the reasons that I have named that this matter might be postponed until December, so that it can be seen if something better cannot be done; and in order to clear my skirts for the future I move to postpone the joint resolution until the first Monday in December.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I have no special desire to have this joint resolution carried through, but the matter has been repeatedly brought to the attention of the committee of which I am chairman and to the attention of Congress at the present session by the Postmaster-General. Both committees visited the Department some time ago in order to confer with the Department in regard to the necessity for a new building for city post-office purposes. The Postmaster-General represents in his communication and he represented to us that there was a pressing necessity for leasing a building, and that they could not get along with the public business unless they had more room. He, I suppose, is the best judge of that. I knew very little about it; I know very little about it now beyond what has come from him. Anxious, therefore, to serve the public interest in the matter, I moved in it, but I have no special desire to champion this measure at all. If the Senator from Vermont thinks that it would be wise to let it lie over I am very willing; but if any regard is to be paid to the recommendation of the Postmaster-General in the matter, and there is a necessity for it according to his recommendation, this is a proper subject for the consideration of the Senate. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, this question was up before the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at the last session; and the proposition that has come to us from the House is precisely what was agreed upon by the committee of the Senate at the last session. It is true that the Post-Office Department at the present time is greatly overcrowded. There is at least double the amount of business to be done in the Post-Office Department that was required to be done at the time of its original construction. I only know from the statements of the Postmaster-General and the postmaster of the city that it is almost impossible to creditably discharge the duties of the city post-office as it now is, and it greatly incommodes the business of the General Post-Office Department.

This proposition is gotten up in order to bridge over the time that may be required to investigate as to the proper site and location of a permanent building for the city post-office. I suppose that it is as necessary that there should be a city post-office here as in a great many other portions of the Union. I think that this measure is in the interest of economy, and I therefore hope that the motion of my colleague will not be adopted, but that we shall allow the Department to lease temporarily some suitable quarters for the accommodation of the business of the Department.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I was not present in the committee when this matter was considered, but I desire to second the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont who has just taken his seat, [Mr. MORRILL.] During the last Congress and during the present session my attention, as one of that committee, has been called repeatedly to the absolute necessity of further accommodation to the Post-Office Department. The business of both the Post-Office Department and the city post-office is increasing every day and requiring more room, the employment of more men to carry it on, and the two together are crowding the business in that building so that it is practically impossible to get along without its being crowded out into some other building.

The proposition to rent a building temporarily relieves Congress from the great pressure there is made on all sides by parties interested in real estate to induce Congress to make a purchase right off at this moment. I do not think that is wise, but there should be a temporary renting at so moderate a sum as is limited by this joint resolution; although I do not know what evidence there was before the committee to show that a suitable building could be obtained for that sum, I assume that the committee have ascertained that such a sum as that would secure proper and convenient accommodations for three years. In that time, if Congress shall deem it wise, as I think they ought, to erect a suitable building upon some property owned by themselves in this city, or even if they should be induced, as I hope they will not be, to make a purchase of ground here, they will have time enough to do it; and in the mean time the city post-office and the Government will be relieved of what is a pressing necessity upon them.

I do not blame the chairman of the committee for suggesting that if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] desires to crowd out the Postmaster-General he will not trouble himself very much about it; but it seems to me if the Senator from Vermont would go over the Post-Office Department and from personal examination see the condition of things there he would agree with the Senator from Florida that the joint resolution ought to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, shall the consideration of the joint resolution be postponed until the first Monday in December next?

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 29, noes 13.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WITHERS. On behalf of the Committee on Pensions, I report back the petition referred to them of Frederic Oechsle. The object of the petition is to correct a military record, and it was referred to the Committee on Pensions. I report it back, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The change will be made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McDONALD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 614) for the relief of Alexander Swift & Co., partners, and Alexander Swift & Co. and the Niles Works; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 615) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 616) to promote the efficiency of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 32) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the brig Katie; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That ought to go over, and go to a committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope it may not go to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is a very simple thing, and I think I can get unanimous consent. This is a bark that was built at Calais, in Maine, and was sold to foreign owners, and while abroad attained a register as a Costa Rican vessel under her present name. Since that time it has been bought by two citizens of the State of New York, and they ask that she shall simply have an American register. There is nothing else in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see that that helps it any.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Vermont objects, the joint resolution cannot be considered at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir, I do object; and as the case is stated I do not think she ought to have it; it is not fair play.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the claim of Martha G. Vaughn and Louisa Jackman, on the file of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. WHYTE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Perry E. Brocchus, administrator of the estate of Augustin Maurin, deceased, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. If there is no further morning business I move that the Senate proceed with the unfinished business, being the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing else being moved, the Chair will declare the morning hour at an end and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is, is the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] in order. That amendment will be reported again for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is, on page 70, line 1705, after the words "seventy-six," to insert:

Provided, That the claims for arrears of pensions shall be settled and determined as rapidly as possible, and as fast as determined, and as often as once in thirty days, the Secretary of the Interior shall make requisition upon the Secretary of the Treasury for funds necessary to pay all claims then settled; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to promptly meet such requisitions by placing to the credit of the Commissioner of Pensions the amount of the same out of any money which may be in the Treasury not necessary to meet payments of interest on the public debt.

Mr. BECK. I made the point of order against that amendment on the ground that it changed existing law. If the Chair will allow, I will send to the Chair the law to which I referred. This amendment provides that this shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not necessary to meet the payments of interest on the public debt. By turning to the Revised Statutes, page 724, sections 3687 and so on, the Chair will observe a large number of permanent appropriations to pay the customs service and to pay dozens of other things that by this change are postponed to the payment of the arrears of pensions. It is a change of existing law, and I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what rule of the Senate does the Senator from Kentucky refer?

Mr. BECK. I think it is Rule 27. That rule provides:

All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendment shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law.

That is what I referred to. This was not estimated for; it does not come from any committee; it has none of the elements necessary to bring it within any other exception; and it does change the existing law by postponing all other payments.

I also refer to Rule 29:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill; nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

I stand on Rule 27, that this changes the existing law.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then, added to what my colleague on the committee has so well said as to what money this takes from the Treasury, on the reading of the amendment it strikes me it would take all the money in the Treasury, even that necessary for the payment of the salaries of clerks, and would interfere with the whole machinery of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated at the last sitting of the Senate that this question would be submitted to the Senate. The Chair would not rule this amendment out of order under Rule 27, for it might be understood as a provision to carry out an existing law, the law for the payment of arrears of pensions; but it is a serious question whether it is not general legislation within the meaning of the twenty-ninth rule, and also whether it is relevant to the subject-matter of this bill or that portion of it to which it is moved as an amendment. Now, the question of relevancy this rule requires shall be submitted to the Senate. The Chair therefore thinks it is proper to submit the question, which embraces whether it is general legislation, and also whether it is relevant, to the Senate at the same time. Therefore, Senators, you who are of the opinion that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas is in order will say "ay;" those of contrary opinion will say "no," [putting the question.]

The question was determined in the negative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is ruled to be out of order.

Mr. TELLER. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the same place as the amendment just held to be out of order:

Provided, That the claims for arrears of pensions shall be settled and determined as rapidly as possible, and as often as once in thirty days the Secretary of the Interior shall make requisitions upon the Secretary of the Treasury for funds necessary to pay all claims then settled, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to promptly meet such requisitions by placing to the credit of the Commissioner of Pensions the amount of the same out of any money which may be in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BECK. I believe I will make the point of order on that so that the Chair can examine it. I did not hear the amendment very fully, but it changes an existing law by directing requisitions on the Secretary not imposed by any law.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that it cannot be said to change an existing law. It is to carry out a law already in force.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator from what committee does that come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable. Under the ruling just made by the Senate this is obviously out of order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I offer the following:

On page 69, in line 1696, strike out all after the word "surgeon" down to and including the word "presented," in line 1708, and insert the following:

And provided further, That claims for arrears of pensions shall be adjusted as rapidly as the Commissioner of Pensions with the clerical force at his command can settle and determine the same; and all requisitions by the Secretary of the Interior for the payment of said claims shall have precedence in the Treasury and be promptly paid out of any money not specially held for redemption purposes, except as hereinafter provided, and which may not be necessary for payments of interest on the public debt; and full requisitions shall be made by the Secretary of the Interior, and the same shall be paid by the Treasury, as often as once in each month to cover all pension-arrears claims then settled and determined: And provided further, That a part or all of the special fund for the redemption of fractional currency under section 1 of joint resolution No. 17, approved July 22, 1876, may be returned on the order of the Secretary of the Treasury to the general fund, if necessary, to meet the requisitions hereinbefore required to be paid, and thereafter the fractional currency presented for redemption shall in proportion to such diversion and use of said special fund be redeemed, if necessary, in any moneys in the Treasury at the time the same shall be presented.

Mr. BECK. I make the same question of order there. That is certainly out of order if the first was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the ruling made by the Senate, there can be no doubt that this is out of order. Are there further amendments to the bill?

Mr. BECK. The committee have no further amendments to the bill, and we hope all amendments now have been acted on that other Senators have. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] desired the floor at one o'clock. There is nothing now in his way. I do not know whether it is proper now to ask that the bill be reported to the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I offered some days ago an amendment, and it was referred to the committee. I would ask if that amendment has been acted on by the committee? It was an amendment to come in as a section at the end of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I found that amendment for the first time this morning on our tables; it was offered on Saturday, headed, "May 17, 1879, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed." I never saw it until this morning. The committee have not examined it.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to offer that amendment at the proper time if the committee does not report it.

Mr. BECK. There will be some discussion to-day I understand. One or two gentlemen desire to speak. It may be that the committee will have an opportunity, either this afternoon or early to-morrow morning, to look over this and some other amendments. Probably it would be well for the Senator from Maine to go on now.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say to the Senate that I wish they would fix some time when we can take the vote on this bill. I think that perhaps to-morrow at four o'clock it may be done.

Mr. LOGAN. I only called attention to this because a remark was made that all amendments had been offered.

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senate to consent to vote on this bill and all the amendments to-morrow at four o'clock. Let us see what the sense of the Senate is.

Several SENATORS. What is that?

Mr. BECK. I ask general consent that all debate on this bill and amendments shall cease to-morrow at four o'clock, and that we then vote on the bill and amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on this bill shall cease to-morrow at four o'clock. Is there objection? [A pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and which he withdrew temporarily in order to allow other motions to be made, to strike out all from the bill beginning with line 2108 down to and including line 2168. Upon this question the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, whether the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] or myself should the more correctly remember a quotation from Mr. Webster's speeches is a matter of very small personal consequence, and of no public importance whatever. It is not, therefore, with any intention of vindicating a better memory or a more accurate quotation that I refer to this subject; but it is because there has been a labored and a persistent attempt, in which I am sorry the Senator from Connecticut has taken part, to misrepresent Mr. Webster and declare that near the close of his life and at the end of his political career he changed his views, and that he had somewhere to some public assemblage practically retracted the great arguments he had made against the State-rights heresies and in behalf of the Constitution and the Union. The honorable Senator from Connecticut on the occasion to which he has himself made reference spoke thus:

I said that Mr. Webster called this "a confederacy of States." I say he called it not only a confederacy of States, but a confederation of States.

Further down, during a little colloquy between the Senator and myself, he said:

When he reads a few words from a certain speech of Mr. Webster does the honorable Senator from Maine undertake to assert on this floor that Mr. Webster did not again and again call this Government not only a confederation of States but a compact between States? I say he did.

Further on the Senator said:

When the proper time arrives—I have not the library of Mr. Webster in my pocket, I do not carry it around with me [laughter]—when the proper time arrives I will show that Mr. Webster called this a confederacy and the Constitution a compact.

The honorable Senator came into the Senate on Friday last and very fully and magnanimously admitted that he had not been able to find, anywhere in Mr. Webster's speeches, that he had called this Government a "confederacy of States," but he was very sure he had called it a compact and "a compact between the States." Let me read what the honorable Senator said:

In 1851, in his celebrated Capon Springs speech, the language of Mr. Webster admits of no dispute. Whatever he may have said on other occasions, whatever he said in his great discussion on the floor of the Senate with Mr. Hayne or with Mr. Calhoun, on the occasion of this speech, in the most unqualified manner, he asserted the fact for which I contend, that the Constitution is a compact between parties competent to enter into a compact, to wit, the States.

The honorable Senator held in his hand at that time a very mischievous book, and I may say he derived his facts, if not his inspiration, from that book, which I have now before me. It is a book written by a gentleman of great influence in the southern country, of acknowledged ability, of long and eminent service in the public councils, Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is, as I have said, a mischievous book. It is mischievous in its title, it is mischievous in its preface, it is mischievous in every word from the opening to the closing chapter; and it is mischievous because, although a sincere man himself, I believe it is an elaborate tissue of absolute misrepresentations, and misrepresentations from a sincere man are much more mischievous than misrepresentations from one who designs to misrepresent.

In this book, which the honorable Senator from Connecticut then held in his hand, Mr. STEPHENS takes the ground that Mr. Webster had recanted and changed his views in regard to the nature of our Government. On the four hundred and third page of the first volume he says:

But besides all this, as a further proof of Mr. Webster's change of views as to the Constitution being a compact between the States, I cite you to a later speech made by him at Capon Springs, in Virginia, on the 28th June, 1851.

And he quotes then what the Senator from Connecticut quoted. Then Mr. STEPHENS says:

In this speech Mr. Webster distinctly held that the Union was a union of States. That the Union was founded upon compact.

Further on Mr. STEPHENS says:

I did not agree with him [Mr. Webster] in his exposition of the Constitution in 1833, but I did fully and cordially agree with him in his exposition in 1839 and 1851. According to that the Constitution was and is a compact between the States.

And in this ingenious attempt to justify the secession that took place in 1861, handing it down to posterity in a history entitled the War Between the States, instead of a rebellion against the Government, Mr. STEPHENS endeavors to enlist Mr. Webster as one of the witnesses that justified that line of proceeding.

Mr. President, mere definition is not a matter on which time can be profitably spent, much less on the rhetorical use of a word. When a man speaks of a "compact" rhetorically, when he speaks of a "continental empire" rhetorically, when he speaks of an "imperial republic" rhetorically, or when, like the Senator from Connecticut, he speaks of a "representative republic of sovereign States," I do not expect to hold him very closely to the line of the definition; and if it were a mere matter of words as to how this man or that man happened in a piece of public declamation to define the nature of the Government, it would not be worth while here to spend the time of the Senate upon it. But the honorable Senator from Connecticut knows, and all with whom he is associated in the political revolution now attempted in this country know, that upon the line of division involved in these words is waged the contest between the two great parties that are contending for mastery in this country; that here is involved the true construction under which this Government is to be administered—whether the Government of the United States shall have the power to uphold itself, or whether it shall be the mere creature of the States, living and breathing and moving at their will and pleasure. On that line the two parties in this country divide; and I have never known a more extraordinary attempt—I will not say disingenuous, for that would imply motive—I have never known a more extraordinary attempt to twist or turn or confound distinctions than the attempt to make Mr. Webster's speech at Capon Springs the basis on which this revelation of his change of view should be established. Both Mr. STEPHENS in his history and the honorable Senator from Connecticut in his speech quoted from a pamphlet copy of Mr. Webster's Capon Springs address. I thought I discovered when the honorable Senator was speaking, that he was not specially familiar with the writings of Mr. Webster; I hope he will not think me scant in courtesy if I say that I have discovered still less familiarity now, because he need not have gone to Mr. STEPHENS's history to get these extracts, nor need he have referred to lost pamphlets containing the whole speech, for here in the authentic life of Mr. Webster, the biography to which Mr. Webster's friends are willing to trust his fame, his life by George T. Curtis, the speech is given in full. And just after that speech was delivered this same delusion which the Senator from Connecticut indicates went all over the South. It was everywhere heralded in the South that Mr. Webster had defined the Union as "a compact," and here is what his eminent biographer says in regard to the report:

What Mr. Webster had said at Capon Springs, in speaking of one of the compacts or compromises between the northern and southern sections of the Union, on which the Constitution was founded, was at once misrepresented, especially in North Carolina—

There was an important election pending in that State at the time, I believe—as a confirmation by him of the doctrine that the Constitution itself is a compact between sovereign States, and as drawing after it, as a resulting right, the right of State secession from the Union. A citizen of North Carolina accordingly wrote to Mr. Webster on this subject, and received from him the following answer, which was immediately made public.

I will not read the whole of it, but Mr. Webster says, speaking of the Government:

It is not a limited confederation, but a government; and it proceeds upon the idea that it is to be perpetual, like other forms of government, subject only to be dissolved by revolution.

* * * * * * *

What I said at Capon Springs was an argument addressed to the North, and intended to convince the North that if by its superiority of numbers it should defeat the operation of a plain, undoubted, and undeniable injunction of the Constitution, intended for the especial protection of the South, such a proceeding must necessarily end in the breaking up of the Government; that is to say, in a revolution.

Here is what Mr. Webster in the speech itself said in reviewing the condition of public sentiment then threatening, as it afterwards broke out in revolution; and here is what Mr. STEPHENS is careful not to quote, and what therefore my honorable friend in his speech could not have been expected to quote. Mr. Webster in referring to the disunion movement found in the South, the State-rights movement then running all over the South, said:

I make no argument against resolutions, conventions, secession speeches, or proclamations. Let these things go on. The whole matter, it is to be hoped, will blow over, and men will return to a sounder mode of thinking. But one thing—

And this is put in italics here as it was in the National Intelligencer, which was Mr. Webster's immediate organ in those days—

But one thing, gentlemen, be assured of, the first step taken in the programme of secession, which shall be an actual infringement of the Constitution or the laws, will be promptly met. [Great applause.]

And I would not remain an hour in any administration that should not immediately meet any such violation of the Constitution and the law effectually and at once. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS does not quote that. But, Mr. President, how absurd, how unjust is the idea of going around and catching up a chance speech at a watering-place in order to convince a certain section of this country which drifted into war in support of a bad theory and which is drifting back into that theory as fast as it can! How absurd, how unjust is the idea of picking up a chance speech delivered in answer to a serenade as the conclusive constitutional opinions of Mr. Webster, when Mr. Webster himself had left in the very last year of his life, and after that speech was delivered, six volumes of his works on which he desired to go down to posterity, on which he rested his fame, and on which he inscribed formal introductions, from which I quote the following:

The principles and opinions expressed in these productions are such as I believe to be essential to the preservation of the Union, the maintenance of the Constitution, and the advancement of the country to still higher stages of prosperity and renown. These objects have constituted my polar star during the whole of my political life, which has now extended through more than half the period of the existence of the Government.

On these speeches, delivered by Mr. Webster in the Senate and in the House and on great public occasions, revised by himself, published under his auspices, he committed himself to history; and from these neither Mr. STEPHENS in his mischievous history nor the honorable Senator from Connecticut affects to quote anything at all. You can hardly open a solitary page in the whole six volumes that does not contain a startling refutation of all the theories that they now pretend Mr. Webster had admitted in the closing days of his life. Let me pick out one instance at random.

In some very brief remarks that I made the other afternoon when the bill was about to be voted upon which the President vetoed, I stated that the democratic party of to-day as represented in this Chamber were the followers of the State-rights school of democracy represented by Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Breckinridge. I believe I was correct in stating that; I believe I was quite within the facts. I read now from Mr. Calhoun's own definition in his celebrated discussion with Mr. Webster, and I think the resolution exactly fits and fills the idea of the Senator from Connecticut as to the true theory of this Government if I understood him aright. Mr. Calhoun submitted the following:

Resolved, That the people of the several States composing these United States are united as parties to a constitutional compact, to which the people of each State acceded as a separate sovereign community, each binding itself by its own particular ratification; and that the Union, of which the said compact is the bond, is a Union between the States ratifying the same.

That is the democratic theory to-day. I doubt if there is a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who will controvert these words of Mr. Calhoun; the Senator from Connecticut asserts the same doctrine in terms. Mr. Calhoun then goes on in a long series of resolutions controverting the idea that we constitute a nation. In answer, Mr. Webster after an elaborate speech sums up and says:

And now, sir, against all these theories and opinions, I maintain—
1. That the Constitution of the United States is not a league, confederacy, or compact between the people of the several States in their sovereign capacities, but a government proper, founded on the adoption of the people, and creating direct relations between itself and individuals.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut expended considerable time the other day to show that the constitutional convention in 1787 expressly excluded the idea that they were founding a nation. Mr. Webster further on in the same speech says:

But, sir, let us go to the actual formation of the Constitution; let us open the journal of the convention itself, and we shall see—

And I beg the honorable Senator's attention to this:

We shall see that the very first resolution which the convention adopted was, "that a national government ought to be established, consisting of a supreme legislature, judiciary, and executive."
This itself completely negatives all idea of league, and compact, and confederation. Terms could not be chosen more fit to express an intention to establish a national government, and to banish forever all notion of a compact between sovereign States.

And yet the Senator broadly asserted that Mr. Webster had made the declaration that this Union was "a compact of States." Mr. Webster does recognize the use of the word "compact," and I will read that, in the same speech.

Mr. EATON. If my friend will permit me, was not that very resolution which he has just read voted down, and voted down on motion of Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; instead of being voted down it was voted up.

Mr. EATON. I think not.

Mr. BLAINE. I will read it again.

The very first resolution which the convention adopted was—

That is what Mr. Webster says—that a national government ought to be established consisting of a supreme legislature, judiciary, and executive.

* * * * * * *

This resolution was adopted on the 30th of May, 1787. Afterward the style was altered, and instead of being called a national government it was called the Government of the United States; but the substance of this resolution was retained, and was at the head of that list of resolutions which was afterward sent to the committee who were to frame the instrument.

Mr. Webster goes on:

It is true, there were gentlemen in the convention, who were for retaining the confederation, and amending its articles; but the majority was against this, and was for a national government.

Continuing, Mr. Webster says:

If, sir, any historical fact in the world be plain and undeniable, it is that the convention deliberated on the expediency of continuing the confederation, with some amendments, and rejected that scheme, and adopted the plan of a national government, with a legislature, an executive, and a judiciary of its own. They were asked to preserve the league, they rejected the proposition. They were asked to continue the existing compact between States, they rejected it. They rejected compact, league, and confederation, and set themselves about framing the constitution of a national government; and they accomplished what they undertook.

In view of these declarations, I do not think the Senator from Connecticut or the honorable author of that book will wish to quote Mr. Webster as saying that the Union was "a compact between States." The sense in which Mr. Webster did use "compact" was this:

Among all the other ratifications—

Speaking of the action of the States after the Constitution was submitted—

Among all the other ratifications, there is not one which speaks of the Constitution as a compact between States. Those of Massachusetts and New Hampshire express the transaction, in my opinion, with sufficient accuracy. They recognize the Divine goodness "in affording THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES an opportunity of entering into an explicit and solemn compact with each other," by "assenting to and ratifying a new Constitution." You will observe, sir, that it is the people, and not the States, who have entered into this compact, and it is the people of all the United States.

I know you will not get tired hearing Mr. Webster. I am making a very good speech out of his works, far better than anything I could say myself. The honorable Senator dwelt at length, and dwelt with that modest form of affirmation which sometimes distinguishes his utterances, upon the idea that no man could deny that it was the States that formed the Constitution, and he quoted as conclusive on that point the provision that it should go into effect upon the ratification of nine States. Mr. Webster, in his second speech on Foote's resolution, spoke thus:

Sir, the opinion which the honorable gentleman [Mr. Calhoun] maintains is a notion founded in a total misapprehension, in my judgment, of the origin of this Government, and of the foundation on which it stands. I hold it to be a popular Government, erected by the people; those who administer it, responsible to the people; and itself capable of being amended and modified, just as the people may choose it should be. It is as popular, just as truly emanating from the people, as the State governments. It is created for one purpose; the State governments for another. It has its own powers; they have theirs.

And then Mr. Webster adds:

We are here to administer a Constitution emanating immediately from the people, and trusted by them to our administration. It is not the creature of the State governments. It is of no moment to the argument, that certain acts of the State Legislatures are necessary to fill our seats in this body. That is not one of their original State powers, a part of the sovereignty of the State. It is a duty which the people, by the Constitution itself, have imposed on the State Legislatures; and which they might have left to be performed elsewhere, if they had seen fit.

He says in another speech:

So much, sir, for the argument, even if the premises of the gentleman were granted or could be proved. But, sir, the gentleman has failed to maintain his leading proposition. He has not shown, it cannot be shown, that the Constitution is "a compact between State governments." The Constitution itself, in its very front, refutes that idea. It declares that it is ordained and established by the people of the United States.

And yet Mr. STEPHENS solemnly represents and asserts that Mr. Webster recanted that opinion.

The Constitution itself, in its very front, refutes that idea. It declares that it is ordained and established by the people of the United States. So far from saying that it is established by the governments of the several States, it does not even say that it is established by the people of the several States; but it pronounces that it is established by the people of the United States in the aggregate. The gentleman says it must mean no more than the people of the several States. Doubtless the people of the several States, taken collectively, constitute the people of the United States; but it is in this their collective capacity, it is as all the people of the United States, that they establish the Constitution. So they declare, and words cannot be plainer than the words used.
When the gentleman says the Constitution is a compact between the States he uses language exactly applicable to the old confederation. He speaks as if he were in Congress before 1789. He describes fully that old state of things then existing. The confederation was in strictness a compact; the States, as States, were parties to it. We had no other general government.

Without continuing and prolonging these extracts, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate—I hope I do not overrate its importance—to the only occasions on which, besides this Capon Springs speech, which Mr. Webster himself hastened to correct by letter, Mr. STEPHENS rests his extraordinary charge. They are first a letter which Mr. Webster addressed when he was in London in 1839 to Baring Brothers & Co., a most respectable and eminent firm of British merchants and financial agents.

At that time there were agents of several States of the Union in London trying to negotiate loans for internal improvements in this country. A doubt was suggested as to whether under the constitutional inhibition that no State could emit bills of credit a State had a right to negotiate a loan; and Mr. Webster at the request of the merchants to whom I have referred wrote an explanatory letter, and because he said in dividing the different powers of the States and the United States Government that it had been left to the States to regulate their own credit—I need not read the whole letter, it is several pages in length—Mr. STEPHENS says it was an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of the States. It was a business letter wholly, and it concludes with a word which I think entirely negatives every presumption of the mischievous kind which Mr. STEPHENS endeavored to attribute to it. Mr. Webster says, in the closing paragraph:

I hope I may be justified by existing circumstances in closing this letter with the expression of an opinion of a more general nature. It is, that I believe the citizens of the United States, like all honest men, regard debts, whether public or private, and whether existing at home or abroad, to be of moral as well as legal obligation; and I trust I may appeal to their history, from the moment when those States took their rank among the nations of the earth to the present time, for proof that this belief is well founded.

Mr. Calhoun had an elaborate resolution saying the States had never taken any rank among the nations of the earth, and I believe the honorable Senator follows in the wake of that argument.

Mr. EATON. Produce what I say when you assert that I have said that.

Mr. BLAINE. I have read a great deal from the Senator this morning, and I will read more before I get through.

Mr. EATON. Perhaps that will be the best part of your speech except what you read from Webster. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I am obliged to the Senator for the exception. It is equal to Dogberry's injunction, "Put God first." [Laughter.]

The other allegation of Mr. STEPHENS was that Mr. Webster, in 1838, five years after his speeches of 1833, had refused to vote against certain resolutions of Mr. Calhoun, and that this refusal was a very pregnant suggestion that he had then changed his mind. He makes a very solemn presentation of the fact that in a series of five resolutions which Mr. Calhoun introduced in 1838, involving all the heretical doctrines of the State-rights, pro-slavery democracy, Mr. Webster had not voted. He does not say that Mr. Webster voted for them, but that he had not voted against them. Those resolutions of Mr. Calhoun were introduced in December, 1837. They went on, as such resolutions will, being a foot-ball for political debate, for some months. On the 22d of March, 1838, after they had been passed upon by the Senate, Mr. Webster referred to them as follows, in regard to the slavery question:

Sir, this is a very grave matter; it is a subject very exciting and inflammable. I take, of course, all the responsibility belonging to my opinions; but I desire these opinions to be understood, and fairly stated. If I am to be regarded as an enemy to the South because I could not support the gentleman's resolutions, be it so. I cannot purchase favors from any quarter by the sacrifice of clear and conscientious convictions. The principal resolution declared that Congress had plighted its faith not to interfere either with slavery or the slave trade in the District of Columbia. Now, sir, this is quite a new idea. I never heard it advanced until this session.

Mr. Webster then proceeds to argue still further:

On such a question, sir, when I am asked what the Constitution is, or whether any power granted by it has been compromised away, or, indeed, could be compromised away, I must express my honest opinion, and always shall express it, if I say anything, notwithstanding it may not meet concurrence either in the South, or the North, or the East, or the West. I cannot express by my vote what I do not believe. The gentleman has chosen to bring that subject into this debate, with which it has no concern, but he may make the most of it, if he thinks he can produce unfavorable impressions against me at the South from my negative to his fifth resolution. As to the rest of them, they were commonplaces generally or abstractions, in regard to which one may well feel himself not called on to vote at all.

And with that record right before him Mr. STEPHENS writes that Mr. Webster's ominous refusal to vote on the resolutions indicated a change of mind, when here was his defiant review of the whole subject of Mr. Calhoun's heresies. And then Mr. Webster proceeded with some remarks which I am disposed to think might now be addressed to the other side of the Chamber, mutatis mutandis, and we should hardly realize that forty years had gone by. Let me read a single paragraph—I wish it were original with me, addressed as Mr. Webster then addressed it—to the opposite side of the Chamber.

The honorable member from Carolina himself habitually indulges in charges of usurpation and oppression against the Government of his country. He daily denounces its important measures, in the language in which our revolutionary fathers spoke of the oppressions of the mother country. Not merely against executive usurpation, either real or supposed, does he utter these sentiments, but against laws of Congress, laws passed by large majorities, laws sanctioned for a course of years by the people. These laws he proclaims, every hour, to be but a series of acts of oppression. He speaks of them as if it were an admitted fact that such is their true character. This is the language he utters, these are the sentiments he expresses, to the rising generation around him. Are they sentiments and language which are likely to inspire our children with the love of union, to enlarge their patriotism, or to teach them, and to make them feel, that their destiny has made them common citizens of one great and glorious Republic? A principal object in his late political movements, the gentleman himself tells us, was to unite the entire South; and against whom or against what does he wish to unite the entire South? Is not this the very essence of local feeling and local regard? Is it not the acknowledgment of a wish and object to create political strength by uniting political opinions geographically?

* * * * * * *

Finally, the honorable member declares that he shall now march off under the banner of State rights. March off from whom? March off from what? We have been contending for great principles. We have been struggling to maintain the liberty and to restore the prosperity of the country. We have made these struggles here, in the national councils, with the old flag—the true American flag, the eagle and the stars and stripes—waving over the Chamber in which we sit. He now tells us, however, that he marches off under the State-rights banner.

Let him go. I remain. I am where I have ever been, and ever mean to be.

The lineal successors of Mr. Webster's great constitutional views can utter those same words to-day and direct them to the same side of the Chamber at which he aimed them then.

I ought not to omit one small point, because there is just one left on which this charge of change of opinion is based. I think the Senator from Connecticut intimated that he would not read the Mark A. Cooper letter, although he gave a strong sideway assurance that if he did it would contain all that he had alluded to about Mr. Webster speaking of compact, of confederation.

Mr. EATON. My friend does not mean to misrepresent me?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly not.

Mr. EATON. I said, on the contrary, that I paid no stress to it whatever.

Mr. BLAINE. Because it was a letter.

Mr. EATON. I paid no stress to it whatever. That one remark I made about it.

Mr. BLAINE. I will read the remark. It was referred to by a Senator not now in his seat. The Mark A. Cooper letter was a letter of courtesy in answer to a gentleman of that name at Macon, Georgia, inviting Mr. Webster to attend a State fair. Mr. Webster wrote with his own felicity of language in regard to agricultural topics, and toward the close of the letter occurs the following:

Let me take the occasion to add, my dear sir, that, as the forms and products of your agriculture are quite different from ours, as your soil and climate are different, and as your social and domestic institutions are also different, it was never intended by the Constitution under which we live that so foolish and impracticable a thing as amalgamation, in these respects, or any of them, should be attempted between Northern and Southern States. The States are united, confederated;—

"Not, chaos-like, together crushed and bruised,
But, like the world, harmoniously confused;
Where order in variety we see,
And where, though all things differ, all agree."

Could there be a more felicitous illustration of the Union sentiment that he represented? I think it was the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] who made that reference; and inasmuch as I have had to call his name up in that connection, I will say something in regard to his speech the other day, which I would much rather say if he were in his seat.

Mr. EATON. My friend will pardon me. After having asserted——

Mr. BLAINE. I am not through with that; wait a moment.

Mr. EATON. After having asserted what you did in regard to what I said on this subject, you should now put into your remarks precisely what I did say with regard to the letter to Mark A. Cooper.

Mr. BLAINE. I will refer to that in due season.

Mr. EATON. I wish you would do so. I do not suppose you desire to misrepresent me.

Mr. BLAINE. Not in the slightest degree. Nor do I desire to misrepresent the honorable Senator from Georgia, who I regret is not in his seat. But the honorable Senator from Georgia the other day made a speech that was somewhat remarkable. Among other things, he depicted the overwhelming grief he had at the secession of the Southern States; and when he was called upon by the independent voters of the county of Troup to represent them in the secession convention he wrote this letter to them, as he says:

I will consent to the dissolution of the Union as I would consent to the death of my father, never from choice, only from necessity, and then in sorrow and sadness of heart.

Well, he was elected on that platform, and he went to the convention, and the convention, as we all know, passed the ordinance of secession. And in the evening of January 19, 1861, he writes to a friend a letter which he quotes himself:

DEAR SIR: The deed is done. Georgia this day left the Union. Cannon have been firing and bells tolling. At this moment people are filling the streets shouting vociferously. A large torchlight procession is moving from house to house and calling out speakers. The resolution declaratory passed on yesterday, and similar scenes were enacted last night. The crowd called loudly for me, but my room was dark, my heart was sad, and my tongue was silent. Whoever may be in fault is not now the question. Whether by the North or by the South or by both, the fact remains; our Union has fallen. The most favored sons of freedom have written a page in history which despots will read to listening subjects for centuries to come to prove that the people are not capable of self-government. How can I think thus and feel otherwise than badly?

These are very just sentiments; and now I want to read the wonderful declaration of the ordinance of Georgia which the Senator from Georgia would consent to have enacted as he would consent to the death of his father, and that so pierced his heart with sadness when it was accomplished. I want to read it, and my friend from Connecticut will observe its language, as he boasted the other day that Connecticut was "a free and independent State."

Mr. EATON. I did not boast. I said that was the oath that Connecticut voters had to take.

Mr. BLAINE. Here is the "ordinance to dissolve the union between the State of Georgia and other States united with her under a compact of government entitled the Constitution of the United States." This is the original journal of the Georgia convention; it is a rare book. The literature of that section from some cause is very hard to procure:

We, the people of the State of Georgia, in convention assembled, do declare and ordain, and it is hereby declared and ordained,

That the ordinance adopted by the people of the State of Georgia in convention on the 2d day of January, in the year of our Lord 1788, whereby the Constitution of the United States of America was assented to, ratified, and adopted; and also all acts and parts of acts by the General Assembly of this State, ratifying and adopting amendments of the said Constitution, are hereby repealed, rescinded, and abrogated.

We do further declare and ordain, That the union now subsisting between the State of Georgia and other States, under the name of the "United States of America," is hereby dissolved, and that the State of Georgia is in the full possession and exercise of all those rights of sovereignty which belong and appertain to a free and independent State.

That was the ordinance which the Senator from Georgia said to the people of Troup he would consent to as he would to the death of his father, and the ordinance which the evening after it was passed so filled his heart with sadness that he put out the lights in his room and would not make a speech to a crowd outside serenading him. I have read the yeas and nays on that and what is my unbounded surprise to find that the Senator from Georgia himself voted for the ordinance. Here he is, "Hill of Troup." I believe I am right in saying that he is the man. There were two or three Hills, all voting for it, but "Hill of Troup" voted for it, and he cannot say in defense of that vote that he did it because there was one of those tempestuous and tumultuous rushes of public opinion which bear everything before it and which no man could resist. We know what that is. It sometimes assumes such positive and portentous force as to have mob-like violence. That was not so in this convention. On the call of the yeas and nays there were 208 in favor of the ordinance of secession and 89 against it, and in the 89 were ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and Herschel V. Johnson, who had that very year run for Vice-President on the Douglas ticket. The Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] who would consent to it just as he would to the death of his father, made up his mind that if two hundred and eight men wanted to murder the old man he would join with them. [Great laughter and applause.] Rather than be in a minority he would join the murderous crowd [laughter] and be a parricide.

Nobody would possibly infer from the speech the honorable Senator made the other day that he had voted for the ordinance; and I do not say this with any feeling, because I have none. It is now indeed a most extraordinary thing to find a gentleman from the South who was originally for secession. I do not know who was. I see very pleasant and complimentary biographies of the various Senators on that side, and they were all dragged into secession. They were dragged into it because their States went, and the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] was dragged into it because his State did not go.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not hire a substitute.

Mr. BLAINE. He says he did not hire a substitute. That is a piece of wit which I am glad to notice. The Senators from Kentucky have twice, both of them, taken a turn when I was on the floor to say they did not hire a substitute, as if that was something very pungent. In the conscription law passed by a Congress of which I was a member, for the first time in the history of the Government there was no exemption of Senators or Representatives from the draft.

I was a younger man then than I am now, and among the very first men drafted in my district I was one. I did not resign my seat in Congress. I did send a substitute. What would the honorable Senator have done?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should have gone.

Mr. BLAINE. You would have gone!

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would have gone to the fight.

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad you would have gone in any way on the Union side. But the Senator was not drafted, and he went and fought against the Government, even when his State did not secede. I consider this reference to a substitute as a first-class sarcasm; and as the Senators from Kentucky have each tried their hands on it only twice, I hope they will repeat it again.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When my country calls for my services in the Army, I am ready.

Mr. BLAINE. I am not disputing it. I only say the honorable Senator went into the rebellion because his State did not go.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator did his substitute fight?

Mr. BLAINE. No. I found out afterward that he was a democrat. [Laughter.] I was inveigled into hiring him without knowing who he was.

Mr. EATON. Did he sell himself for half price?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know. I paid full price for him, more than an average democrat was worth in the war. [Great laughter.] And that leads me to remark that the honorable Senator from Georgia took occasion to felicitate his northern democratic associates that they were the men—I regret that the honorable Senator from Connecticut is not in his seat; I dislike to lose the sight of his pleasant countenance, as I am going to refer to him—the honorable Senator from Georgia made the astonishing assurance that this Union had been saved by the northern democrats; they were the men that did it! It was the northern democrats! Why, in Connecticut it was not William A. Buckingham or JOSEPH R. HAWLEY that helped save the Union. The honorable Senator from Connecticut did it. I was just referring to the honorable Senator; I see he has come back. It was not in New York William H. Seward that did anything for the Union; it was Governor Seymour. Out in Ohio it was not Salmon P. Chase that helped along the Union cause, but it was Clement L. Vallandigham! Of course; and what a prodigious delusion Mr. Lincoln was laboring under during the whole of that time! What a great loss Mr. Lincoln met with when he did not have the advice and counsel and aid of the honorable Senator from Georgia, because I have here a very remarkable document of Mr. Lincoln's, from which the casual reader of history would infer that somehow Mr. Lincoln did not think the democrats were helping him along as rapidly as the Senator from Georgia says they were. I do not think the honorable Senator from Connecticut himself would say that he helped along the war for the Union very much.

Mr. EATON. If the Senator from Maine has any desire to make a personal attack upon me with regard to any position that I have ever occupied upon this or any other question, let him proceed to make it.

Mr. BLAINE. Not the slightest. I do not consider a gentleman's public position to be the slightest matter of personal attack.

Mr. EATON. Then do not infer anything. Make any charge you please.

Mr. BLAINE. I was referring to the fact that the honorable Senator from Georgia—at the time he rested his eye directly on the Senator from Connecticut whose pleasant face I love to look into—gave us the assurance on this side that we were tremendously mistaken in supposing the republicans had done anything toward saving the Union; it was the democrats that had saved it, the northern democrats. Well, I said, if that be so, Mr. Lincoln was the victim of a prodigious delusion. Mr. Lincoln did not think so. It happened under the authority of a military officer who now graces this body with his presence, the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] that Mr. Vallandigham was arrested. His release was sought by a committee of a great convention of the democrats of Ohio. They had a very notable interview and a very notable correspondence with Mr. Lincoln, and I beg after the lapse of fifteen or sixteen years to refer to that correspondence. I will read an extract the moral of which will explain itself:

At the same time—

Says Mr. Lincoln—

your nominee for governor, in whose behalf you appeal, is known to you and to the world to declare against the use of an army to suppress the rebellion. Your own attitude, therefore, encourages desertion, resistance to the draft, and the like, because it teaches those who incline to desert and to escape the draft to believe it is your purpose to protect them, and to hope that you will become strong enough to do so.

After a short personal intercourse with you, gentlemen of the committee, I cannot say I think you desire this effect to follow your attitude; but I assure you that both friends and enemies of the Union look upon it in this light.

Mr. Lincoln distinctly understood how the South regarded it—both friends and enemies of the Union look upon it in this light. It is a substantial hope, and by consequence a real strength to the enemy. It is a false hope, and one which you would willingly dispel. I will make the way exceedingly easy. I send you duplicates of this letter, in order that you, or a majority, may, if you choose, indorse your names upon one of them, and return it thus indorsed to me, with the understanding that those signing are thereby committed to the following propositions, and to nothing else.

Now, mark you, he was addressing a committee that represented the democratic party of Ohio, speaking for the whole party. Mr. Lincoln says I want you to commit yourselves just to this, gentlemen, nothing else:

1. That there is now a rebellion in the United States, the object and tendency of which is to destroy the National Union; and that, in your opinion, an army and navy are constitutional means for suppressing that rebellion;

2. That no one of you will do anything which, in his own judgment, will tend to hinder the increase or favor the decrease or lessen the efficiency of the Army and Navy, while engaged in the effort to suppress that rebellion; and

3. That each of you will, in his sphere, do all he can to have the officers, soldiers, and seamen of the Army and Navy, while engaged in the effort to suppress the rebellion, paid, fed, clad, and otherwise well provided for and supported.

And with the further understanding that, upon receiving the letter and names thus indorsed, I will cause them to be published, which publication shall be, within itself, a revocation of the order in relation to Mr. Vallandigham.

And this party, this northern democratic party that fought out the rebellion and restored the Union, would not put their names to these propositions. These representatives of a State convention that spoke for the entire party would not acknowledge that there was a rebellion, would not acknowledge that an army and navy could be used to suppress it, would not acknowledge that they would do anything whatever to aid in paying or feeding or clothing or supporting that army. So Mr. Lincoln gave them in another letter on the same subject, a letter addressed to Mr. Corning, of New York, a little advice, applicable to both—advice which I think will live for its patriotism and eloquence almost as long as his Gettysburgh speech. He wrote to Mr. Corning:

Long experience has shown that armies cannot be maintained unless desertion shall be punished by the severe penalty of death. The case requires, and the law and the Constitution sanction, this punishment. Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts, while I must not touch a hair of a wily agitator who induces him to desert? This is none the less injurious when effected by getting a father, or brother, or friend, into a public meeting, and there working upon his feelings until he is persuaded to write the soldier boy that he is fighting in a bad cause, for a wicked administration of a contemptible Government, too weak to arrest and punish him if he shall desert. I think that in such a case, to silence the agitator and to save the boy, is not only constitutional, but withal a great mercy.

That was what he did. He sent a good many of the democratic agitators to Fort Lafayette and saved the boys.

On Saturday last there was quite a prolonged debate in reference to the State of Delaware. When I had the honor to address the Senate some weeks ago the honorable Senator from Delaware, not in his seat on Saturday, whom I see now in his seat, [Mr. BAYARD,] brought up as a case of special grievance to the patriotic heart of that State that he had had to march, I believe himself, to the polls between files of soldiers, and that it was a great outrage. I intimated at the time—I did not have the book in my hand—that I did not think the record of Delaware for loyalty to the Union was what the Senator represented it. I do not think so now, because the Legislature of that State, at the very time to which the honorable Senator referred, passed this act:

And be it further enacted as aforesaid, That if any inspector, presiding officer, or judge of any election in this State, or any other person, shall administer or cause to be administered to any legal voter in this State any oath or affirmation not authorized by the constitution and laws of this State for that purpose as a prerequisite or condition of voting at any election in this State, except when such oath or affirmation shall be administered in order to satisfy such inspector, presiding officer, or judge that such vote is a legal vote according to the constitution and laws of this State, such inspector, presiding officer, judge, or other person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof by indictment, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay to the State a fine not less than $500 and not more than $1,000, and shall be imprisoned for a term of ten days.

That law was aimed at the effort of the United States Government to prevent disloyal men voting in Delaware, and only at that because under the directions of Mr. Lincoln the order had been issued that to any suspected persons the following oath should be administered as a prerequisite to their voting:

I do solemnly swear that I will support, protect, and defend the Constitution and Government of the United States against all enemies, whether domestic or foreign; that I hereby pledge my allegiance, faith, and loyalty to the same, any ordinance, resolution, or law of any State convention or State Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding; that I will at all times yield a hearty and willing obedience to the said Constitution and Government, and will not, directly or indirectly, do any act in hostility to the same, either by taking up arms against them, or aiding, abetting, or countenancing those in arms against them; that, without permission from the lawful authority, I will have no communication, direct or indirect, with the States in insurrection against the United States, or with either of them, or with any person or persons within said insurrectionary States; and that I will in all things deport myself as a good and loyal citizen of the United States. This I do in good faith, with a full determination, pledge, and purpose to keep this, my sworn obligation, and without any mental reservation or evasion whatsoever.

That was all that was exacted. All that was exacted of any man in Delaware was to do what the honorable Senator himself has had to do at the bar of the Senate, and every other Senator on this floor who did not take part in the rebellion.

Mr. BAYARD. Would it be agreeable to the Senator for me to make a remark?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it is not for me to gauge the motives or describe the intent of the honorable Senator from Maine——

Mr. BLAINE. Nor would it be parliamentary.

Mr. BAYARD. In thus referring to the events that transpired within the State of Delaware during the years of the war. I think this was in 1863.

Mr. BLAINE. I am replying to the Senator's colleague and to himself.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator spoke of "the Senator from Delaware who was in his seat," and evidently directed his remarks to me.

Mr. BLAINE. I referred to the honorable Senator who is now on the floor in what he said some weeks ago.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know what I said some weeks ago; the honorable Senator has not quoted my language; but I merely wish to say a few words now.

The State of Delaware is one of the original thirteen States of this Union. Her sons gave their life-blood to build up this Government, to achieve the independence of that colony and her sisters from the rule of Great Britain. When that independence had been achieved,—and her children marked the soil of this country with their blood from Long Island to the Carolinas, and their names and their valor are connected with every stricken field of that great struggle,—when that independence had been achieved and this Government came to be builded up, Delaware sent to the councils that framed the Constitution good men and true who loved the country in peace as well as they had served and loved her in war; and from that day to this no State in this Union, no set of men in any State in this Union, have a better claim to established fidelity to every principle of law, to every principle of the Union, to every principle of civil and constitutional liberty, than the men who have carried on the government of that State.

The Senator cannot lay his finger upon one act of that State collectively, I am speaking of it as a State, nay, he cannot read the history of the State from the beginning to the end but that he will find it marked all over by patriotic devotion, devotion to the Union, devotion to the Constitution, devotion to everything for which that Union and Constitution were ordained. And, so, when this war came upon us, throughout the war, from the beginning to the end, there never was a thought nor an act unfaithful to the cause of the Union, to the cause of constitutional and civil liberty to which the people of that State ever gave anything but adherence. They were faithful from the first to the last, and it needed no prompting.

I have felt the insult of the imputation that there was in me, in my most secret heart, in any drop of blood that warmed it, a suggestion of infidelity to the Government of my fathers. I have resented it; I never have permitted it to be expressed where my personal resentment would check it. I have denounced those who would impugn my fidelity, and on this very floor have made prompt and fitting answer to those whom I thought did impugn it.

Sir, the oath which the gentleman has read was an oath proposed to be put by a military authority without color of law, or warrant to citizens of Delaware. What did Delaware need to urge her to stand by this Government, its Constitution, and its laws? They were hers; she had helped to make them; she had never disobeyed them. It was a foul slander then as it is now to suggest that there was infidelity in any part of that State or of her laws. Our Constitution gave us the right to vote in that State, our laws and Constitution prescribed our qualifications as voters, and we denounced then as I denounce now the power of any outside military influence to add to those qualifications or to change those laws in our behalf.

What, then, sir, is the object of reading this resolution? We did not believe it was in the power of any military officer of the United States, nay, of any civil officer of the United States, to impose new conditions upon us or put us to the test and purgation of oaths. If that be the order that General Schenck issued, I remember well that every man in that State felt it to be an imputation.

Mr. BAYARD. At least every member of the democratic party in that State felt it to be an imputation that there should be offered to them an oath over and above the oath prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State, which they had always taken. If there ever had been infidelity, there might have been some excuse; but no man can say then, and no man can say to-day with truth, with common honesty, that that State or her people ever were unfaithful to the Government, to the Constitution, and to the laws of the Union.

Therefore, I say that this imputation is unfit for this place; it is unmerited and unworthy. The State needs no defense from me. I am only too proud and happy to know that I was born upon her soil and that I share the reputation of so honored, so honorable and law-abiding a community.

I object, sir, to the Senator reading resolutions for the purpose of casting imputations upon one of this family of States. The reputation of that State is dear to her children; it is dear to those who represent her on this floor. It is part of the honorable history of this country, and no man can sneer that reputation away without having his acts and his words recoil upon himself. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Order must be preserved in the galleries.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator shows undue sensibility or sensitiveness. He himself made the reference originally in the debate, and what I quoted was simply the act of his own Legislature.

Mr. President, if there was any one thing that might have been called the ruling passion in the policy of Mr. Lincoln it was to deal tenderly with the border States. He took every coercive step relating to those States with reluctance and with hesitation. General Schenck, on consultation and by direction of Mr. Lincoln, issued an order reciting that—

> It is known that there are many evil-disposed persons now at large in the State of Delaware who have been engaged in rebellion against the lawful Government, or have given aid or comfort or encouragement to others so engaged, or who do not recognize their allegiance to the United States, and who may avail themselves of the indulgence of the authority which tolerates their presence to attempt to take part in or embarrass the approaching special election in that State.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him the date of that order?

Mr. BLAINE. That order was issued in 1863.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wished to know——

Mr. BLAINE. Wait one moment, one Senator from Delaware at a time. Now I am quoting the acts of Mr. Lincoln. The honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] need not attempt to pass this off with some indignation about an attack upon his State. I am quoting the acts of his own Legislature; I am quoting the official acts of Mr. Lincoln. More than that, while I do not at all desire to say anything personally offensive to the honorable Senator, at the same time I shall not attempt to steer clear of palpable, historic facts. The Senator has spoken with great eulogy of the patriotic devotion of Delaware to the Union. I find a resolution by the venerable father of the present Senator:

> Senator James A. Bayard was a member of the committee on platform, and claims to have urged the declaration that the reconstruction acts are "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void." He left his seat in the Senate rather than take the test oath. On the 30th of March, 1861, Mr. Bayard offered the following:
> "Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, has full power and authority to accept the declaration of the seceding States that they constitute hereafter an alien people, and to negotiate and conclude a treaty with the Confederate States of America, acknowledging their independence as a separate nation."

I am treating of public facts. The fact that the honorable Senator who offered that resolution chances to be the father of the honorable Senator here present shall not prevent my referring to it as a historic fact, and the Senator cannot prove by that record of his father that Delaware was so devoted in her attachment to the Union that Mr. Lincoln need not take care to look out for that State.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator threw in just then in respect to the gentleman of whom he spoke, and of whom I have the honor to be the son, that he had resigned his seat rather than take the test oath.

Mr. BLAINE. I read that from the text. The resolution was what I was after. I did not really intend to read that.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir; but the Senator should have been more careful of his facts. He said that designedly, I apprehend.

Mr. BLAINE. I read it from the text here. What I was after was the resolution, and if the Senator desires to see what I intended reading I will read it again.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator may read it of course, for I have no control over what he shall read or what he shall not read, but I have something to say in regard to the statement that Mr. James A. Bayard resigned his seat in this body rather than take the test oath. If the Senator had been acquainted with the truth of history he would have found that Mr. James A. Bayard did take the test oath protesting that it was wrong to administer extra oaths beyond the constitutional requirements. He did take the test oath, he took it conscientiously and truly. He then resigned his seat in this body and was reappointed to his place here after an interval of two years. If the Senator will examine the debate which took place at that time he will find that there were many distinguished gentlemen of the republican party, the peers of any in that party for intellect or character, who agreed with Mr. Bayard at that time that such an oath was unconstitutional and was not competent to be put to members of this body. Therefore, let not the statement go forth that he resigned his seat in this body rather than take this test oath. He took it with a clear conscience.

In regard to the other resolution affirming the powers of Congress speculatively to put an end to the terrible struggle that then was going on in this country, I have nothing to say. It was a question in many men's minds—those who loved this Union quite as well as the Senator ever loved it, or those with whom he now acts, and they did believe that a time might come when it would be a matter of necessity that there should be a separation. I could name gentlemen of great distinction, leading names in the republican party, who doubted whether the war at one time could have been brought to successful issue. Were they to be punished for that opinion? It was but an opinion and given as one. Does that imply that such opinions were held to be infidelity to this Government or its laws or the Union of the States under it? I apprehend not.

I have no design to go back, for I deprecate this reopening of old causes of difference, but still when it comes, and a Senator as a Senator has it in his power to bring it forward, any man can raise an issue, it cannot be prevented,—but when it does come, and I and the community which I represent, or individuals connected with me by blood are to be arraigned for an unpatriotic course in respect of our country, then it is time and it is proper for me to answer; and I have done so as I thought right.

Mr. BLAINE. The arraignment for unpatriotic conduct was on the part of the Senators from Delaware, both I believe, in the case of Mr. Lincoln, first by the Senator who has just spoken, and more elaborately by his colleague, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] who occupied the floor on Saturday last. Take the whole of this narrative together, if the Senator will give me his attention:

> Senator James A. Bayard was a member of the Committee on Platform, and claims to have urged the declaration that the reconstruction acts are "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void." He left his seat in the Senate rather than take the test oath. On the 30th of March, 1861, Mr. Bayard offered the following:

The honorable Senator has said that on some extreme point that was never reached in the minds of men who supported the war, there might have come a necessity for conceding a separation. I suppose if everybody had been beaten and the last man, as Henry Winter Davis said, had fallen, the Union would have been dissolved. But this resolution was offered on the 30th of March 1861, within less than four weeks after Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated. I will read it again. Mr. Bayard offered this:

That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, has full power and authority to accept the declaration of the seceding States that they constitute hereafter an alien people, and to negotiate and conclude a treaty with the Confederate States of America acknowledging their independence as a separate nation.

If the Senator will follow me I think he will probably find that this whole narrative is correct:

Before that, on the 16th of January, 1861, Mr. Bayard voted against a resolution declaring that any hopes of constructing a new government were "dangerous, illusory, and destructive," and that "to the maintenance of the existing Union and Constitution should be directed all the energies of all the departments of the Government and the efforts of all good citizens." To prove that he was not such a one he voted no. On the 17th of July, 1862, he voted against an important war measure, and continued in the same spirit while he remained in the Senate. He has returned to the Senate, having taken the test oath.

This refers to the first time the test oath was submitted, and the other to the second. Whether that is historically correct I do not know, but the resolution was the main point. That was historically correct, and that resolution was the special fact. With the large influence of the Senator and his family in the State Mr. Lincoln did not regard Delaware as standing strongly or firmly at all in the support of war measures.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. This resolution, the Senate will observe, was moved before Virginia had seceded; it was before Sumter had been fired on; it was in the spring of 1861, at the very initial point of the rebellion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I may remark that having stated the fact attending the taking of this test oath I had supposed the Senator from Maine would accept it as I stated it, but if necessary I can procure the record and exhibit it to the Senate here. The Senator seems to be in doubt as to whether this test oath was taken in the manner I mentioned. The record will speak for itself.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator does himself injustice.

Mr. BAYARD. Again I say that the test oath was taken by Mr. Bayard previous to his resignation. He was reappointed two years subsequently, and of course took the oath the second time.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course I will accept any statement the Senator makes of his personal knowledge. Let that go. But I am vindicating not only the act of Mr. Lincoln toward the State of Delaware, but I am vindicating, if further vindication were necessary after the words of the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] on Saturday, the name and the fame of General Robert C. Schenck against the aspersions of the junior Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] He does not need any defense; and certainly he does not need defense in a great patriotic act which he was performing in accordance with the wishes and under the express directions of Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. President, I pass to another subject. The allusion made by the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] to the Mark A. Cooper letter was this:

He—

said that we were united confederately, in his celebrated Mark A. Cooper letter; but that was a letter, not a speech, and therefore upon that I lay no stress whatever.

That is all I said.

Mr. EATON. My friend will find when he comes to look at his speech in the RECORD that he said very much more than that.

Mr. BLAINE. If I did I will correct it.

Mr. EATON. I hope so.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire now the attention of the honorable Senator from Connecticut to another point. The honorable Senator, I do not say without justice, claims for himself, as we are glad to admit, that he possesses great frankness. I think he is a courageous man; I have not the slightest doubt about it; I hold the proof of it in my hands. No man will ever doubt the courage of the Senator after hearing this portion of his speech. Referring to the President's veto he said:

Mr. President, for one I accept the gage of battle.

That sounds at the beginning like a proclamation of war. That was an intimation to us all that we had better stand around.

For one I accept the gage of battle. The President of the United States has said to the law-making power, and said it to the only power that can make laws, to the only power that has the right to legislate, that he will use the Army at the polls.

It took an immense deal of courage to make that assertion. But the Senator's courage did not give out there. He said further:

I know certain wise gentlemen in this Chamber, and newspaper men as well as members of Congress, have ventured to figure up how much legislative power the Executive has. He has none. The legislative power by the Constitution is granted to the two Houses of Congress. The Executive has not a particle of legislative power. He has a qualified veto, but that is no more legislation than a horse-chestnut is a chestnut horse.

Then the Senator goes on:

I say, then, that this man—

That is the way gentlemen who believe Mr. Tilden is de jure President, I believe, refer to the President of the United States:

I say, then, that this man has thrown down the gage of battle. He has said to the Congress of the United States, "I will, if I choose, use the Army at the polls."

And that appears in the Senator's speech in quotation marks. Further along he said:

Not one man, not one dollar will I ever vote when the captain-general of the United States tells me that he will use the Army at the polls. Let the Army go.

When the followers of the Senator in Connecticut read that speech and do not see the veto (and probably he will send them the speech and they will not get the veto) they will absolutely believe that the President of the United States did directly say, "I will, if I choose, use the Army at the polls." That appears in quotation marks in the Senator's speech.

Mr. EATON. It should not if it does. I do not revise my speeches.

Mr. BLAINE. It should not appear at all. If the Senator attempts to correct his speech I advise him not to stop with striking out the quotation marks but to strike it all out, because the Senator being a frank and a candid man wants to state exactly what is the truth.

Mr. EATON. That statement is true.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator says now that the President of the United States, or this "man," as he calls him, or this "captain-general," as he refers to him—anything but President—says "I will, if I choose, use the Army at the polls." Now, I hold the two veto messages of the President in my hand. In the first message the President says:

From this brief review of the subject it sufficiently appears that, under existing laws, there can be no military interference with the election. No case of such interference has in fact occurred since the passage of the act last referred to. No soldier of the United States has appeared under orders at any place of election in any State. No complaint even of the presence of United States troops has been made in any quarter. It may therefore be confidently stated that there is no necessity for the enactment of section 6 of the bill before me to prevent military interference with the elections. The laws already in force are all that is required for that end.

I suppose it was in the other veto message that the Senator thinks the words that he attributes to the President, or the sentiment that he attributes to the President, may be found. They are not in the first message, surely? Then I take up the other veto message, and in answer to the Senator's assurance to the hosts who stand behind him in Connecticut that the President says he will use the Army just wheir he chooses at the polls, quotation marks or no quotation marks, let me read what the President actually says:

Holding as I do the opinion that any military interference whatever at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and would tend to destroy the freedom of elections, and sincerely desiring to concur with Congress in all of its measures, it is with very great regret that I am forced to the conclusion that the bill before me is not only unnecessary to prevent any such interference, but is a dangerous departure from long-settled and important constitutional principles.

I say that proves the Senator from Connecticut to be a very courageous man. It proves him to be a man of lively imagination as well. It proves him to be able to read an important State document and to assert things as positively contained in it when absolutely the reverse is stated; and there is not one shadow of foundation for what the Senator stated. Why, he dreamed it. He got that speech ready for some bill or some veto that did not come. The Senator evidently framed that for an emergency that did not arise; and whether the President said so or not, he himself shot that speech off for the democracy of Connecticut. Mr. President, it is trifling with a great subject for a Senator to make such a statement in view of those two veto messages. It is denying absolute, plain, palpable facts stated with great precision of language.

I observe further in the Senator's speech a quotation which I find in other speeches on that side of the Chamber, to the effect that the President of the United States does not possess a particle of legislative power, but possesses a qualified veto; and at that point the Senator advises us of a fact which he thought at least myself, if not other Senators, had never heard before, namely, that the equality of representation in the Senate could not be destroyed except with the consent of all the States, or——

Mr. EATON. I did not say that; I did not say any such thing.

Mr. BLAINE. Or, I was going to say, as the Senator chose to put it, that Connecticut is stronger than the other thirty-seven States.

Mr. EATON. In that regard.

Mr. BLAINE. In that regard; in regard to the equality of the representation in the Senate. Was not that what that Senator spoke of?

Mr. EATON. What I said was this, and it will not be denied——

Mr. BLAINE. I will wait until I hear it before I admit it.

Mr. EATON. I assume common honesty in the Senator from Maine, and therefore it will not be denied. I say that the thirty-seven other States of the Union cannot deprive the State of Maine of its two representatives on this floor. It can only be done by the act of Maine alone.

Mr. BLAINE. We knew that in Maine a long time ago; that is not at all new to us.

Mr. EATON. I am glad you know that in Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. And we have known some other things in Maine which do not seem to have reached the Senator from Connecticut with the same distinctness. If the Senator as long as he is not averse to taking the floor will explain to me not only for himself but for the sundry gentlemen who have used the same phrase what he means by the President possessing "a qualified veto," I would be glad to hear him.

Mr. EATON. Does my friend desire to hear me now on that point?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, I always like to hear the Senator.

Mr. EATON. I will state what I meant when I used the term "a qualified veto." I do not answer for any other Senator; each Senator will answer for himself. I mean that the fathers who framed the Constitution, in giving the veto power to the President, did not give him, it was not their intention to give him, an absolute denial over all legislation. Any gentleman who reads the debates called Elliot's Debates and the writings of Madison will come precisely to the same conclusion. I call it a qualified veto. That is, if hasty legislation, if unconstitutional legislation is offered to the President of the United States he undoubtedly ought to use this qualified power which he possesses, but it is not a general absolute power to destroy the legislation of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought the honorable Senator had got his notions of his "qualified veto" from some writings outside of the Constitution itself. There was a Scotch peasant once found by the wayside reading the notes of Dr. Adam Clarke's Family Bible, and his minister being pleased with it, asked him how he got on. He said he could get along very well with the text, and after awhile he thought he would come to understand the notes. I think if the honorable Senator from Connecticut had begun with the text of the Constitution and read that, he need not have gone to the notes, and he would have learned that the veto power of the President is put under the legislative head, in the legislative article. I am inferring that the honorable Senator never read this part of the Constitution at all. Let me read it to him:

> Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law.

If the Senator will figure that up by arithmetic he will find that if the bill which he reported in this branch should upon reconsideration in the House receive every vote of the two hundred and ninety-two members and should come here and receive fifty of the seventy-six Senators, the other twenty-six being against it, the power of the President of the United States with those twenty-six Senators is enough to stop the bill from becoming a law. I think the Senator would admit that. The only qualification of the veto power in the whole Constitution is simply upon the conscience and the oath of the President as to whether he "approves" a bill. If he approves it he shall sign it; if he does not approve it he shall return it with his objections, and then if two-thirds of Congress are not ready to pass it over his veto it is remanded to the people for further consideration. That is the whole of it and all there is of it, and all attempt to revise it and qualify it and get around it and talk about abusing the power is mere nonsense, if I may use the term with proper respect. It is merely flying in the teeth of a plain, palpable section of the Constitution.

There has been a great deal of reference made here to the republican party at the time Andrew Johnson vetoed measures. Well, when we had two-thirds we passed them over his veto, and when we did not have two-thirds we did what the honorable Senator from Connecticut says he will not do, we submitted. The Senator tells us that he will not submit, and that he intends so far as his vote is concerned to break up the right arm of national defense rather than submit. Why just think of it? Here is a proposed law that we have gone from 1789 up to this hour without having on the statute books, an entirely new measure. A democratic House and a democratic Senate pass it, and the republican President sends it back with his objections. The Senator from Connecticut, the very man who reported the bill, the organ of the democratic party pro hæc vice, rises in the Senate and says that unless the President consents to that bill, not one dollar shall ever be voted for the Army as far as he can help it.

Mr. EATON. I reiterate it.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator reiterates it. There is where the Senator shows courage again.

Mr. EATON. I have one word to say, with my friend's consent.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. EATON. I say, notwithstanding the sophistry that is to be found in this veto message, the Executive tells the people of this country that he will use the Army at the polls at his pleasure whenever in his judgment it may become necessary. It means at his pleasure and at his discretion. The President says:

> Under the sweeping terms of the bill the National Government is effectually shut out—> from the exercise of the right and from the discharge of the imperative duty to use its whole executive power whenever and wherever required for the enforcement of its laws at the places and times when and where its elections are held.

From what?—

Mr. President, that covers the entire ground of my remarks. In the veto message the President says that if in his judgment it becomes necessary to use the forces of the United States at the election polls he will use that power.

Mr. BLAINE. At the election polls, or at the places where elections are held?

Mr. EATON. Oh, well, my friend is captious.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, well, there is a great difference.

Mr. EATON. The President sticks in a very small piece of bark when he uses an expression of that character. He says in this message that he will use the Army whenever he pleases if in his judgment it becomes necessary.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no.

Mr. EATON. Oh, yes, I say; and therefore I say, whatever other men may do, that I never will vote one dollar to be paid, one man to be used, for so nefarious a purpose as this.

While I am up, as my friend read a little constitutional law for Connecticut, suppose I should read him a little for Maine, and when he gets back there he had better have it printed in the paper that he used to edit:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives,

There is no figuring up to see how much of the power belongs to the President.

Mr. BLAINE. In regard to the point of the President using the troops, the bill which the honorable Senator reported gave two cases in which he is willing they should be used. The honorable Senator himself, in the very bill he is now defending, gave two cases in which he said troops might be used; one if an armed enemy of the United States appeared, and the other if the governor of the State where the election was held made a demand upon the Executive for troops. Apply that to the city of New York. If there was an armed enemy, or if the governor asked for troops, the Senator would have the troops sent there, but if a mob was breaking into the custom-house or into the sub-treasury, or doing any damage to the public property of the United States, then nobody whatever should have the authority to use any troops. The Senator, in other words, is ready to define the cases in which he is willing to have troops used, but he will not leave the President of the United States the slightest possible discretion.

Mr. EATON. The honorable Senator from Maine does not mean to misrepresent me——

Mr. BLAINE. Of course I mean to represent the Senator with absolute accuracy.

Mr. EATON. The Constitution of the United States determines absolutely the two cases to which the honorable Senator alludes and in which he is kind enough to say that I am willing that troops should be used. The great law of the land says that they may be used under those circumstances. Not I, not the President of the United States, but the life of the country provides for the use of troops in those cases.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will stop long enough there, let me remind him that the same Constitution of the United States says that the President of the United States shall execute the laws.

Mr. EATON. And that is the reason why I do not intend to give him any infamous law of this character to execute.

Mr. BLAINE. And that is the very reason why the Senator does not intend to give him any power to execute the laws.

Mr. EATON. Not such laws.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no. I am glad that this scene has shifted a little.

Mr. EATON. So am I.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] representing the southern wing of the democratic party, was put forward first, or put himself forward, to threaten that there should not be any money appropriated if these laws were not repealed; but by some sort of graceful maneuver the Senator from Kentucky has extricated himself from that embarrassment, and now the scene has shifted, the curtain rises again, and there is a different play on the stage. It is not the South at all that wants to repeal these laws; it is the North that is under such abuse, and therefore the honorable Senator from Connecticut from the North is put forward to do the threatening. He is threatening the Federal Government on behalf of the State of Connecticut. He tells us that unless we pass the measure reported by him and unless that becomes a permanent part of the statutes of this country, and the President yields his constitutional convictions against it, there shall not be a soldier in this country.

Mr. EATON. I do not think the President has any constitutional convictions on the subject.

Mr. BLAINE. The President has a right to have a constitutional opinion, with the Senator's permission. The Senator threatens that there shall not be a frontiersman's cabin defended, that there shall not be a fort in the United States manned or armed, that there shall not be a soldier maintained unless the President yields his convictions and his judgment. I am glad that the scene of the threatening has changed and we have got it down to peaceful New England. It is about time, I think, for one of the Senators from the South to get up and twit my friend from Connecticut on the Hartford convention. That is where secession began, that is where resistance to the Federal Government was organized, as they have all said. It has got back to its old place, they can say, and is advocated by the Senator from Hartford, not simply from Connecticut, certainly not from New England. I have denied that he represented New England; he represents Connecticut "officially" and he represents Hartford in his political sentiments, the Hartford that was misrepresented when a convention assembled there; the Hartford denounced by democrats as nullifying the laws of the United States and resisting up to the point of denying its authority either to move its own militia or to use the troops of the United States. I said the Senator was a man of courage. He is no doubt so.

Mr. EATON. I ought to say to my friend that I never took a great deal of stock in that Hartford convention business. It belongs to the fathers of that side of the Chamber and not of this side.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; but I am sorry that the Senator having lived his life in denouncing the Hartford convention is returning now to illustrate the very principles for which that assemblage was denounced.

I need not have confined the reading with which I began the opening part of my remarks to what was said by Mr. Webster. I stated a few days ago that the democracy of to-day were the followers of Calhoun and Breckinridge and not the followers of Jackson and Douglas. I have here some language of Andrew Jackson applicable to the point to which I referred in the earlier part of my remarks:

The defects of the confederation need not be detailed. Under its operation we could scarcely be called a nation. We had neither prosperity at home nor consideration abroad. This state of things could not be endured, and our present happy Constitution was formed, but formed in vain if this fatal doctrine prevails. It was formed for important objects that are announced in the preamble made in the name and by the authority of the people of the United States, whose delegates framed, and whose conventions approved it.

One of the greatest speeches of Mr. Webster was made in support of that proclamation of Andrew Jackson.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended. This Congress has come to a stand-still apparently unless we are to assume that the Senator from Connecticut spoke authoritatively, unless we assume that the honorable Senator spoke for his party when he said no money was to be voted for the Army.

Mr. EATON. I did not.

Mr. BLAINE. Unless the honorable Senator spoke for his party we are not advised as yet of what we are to expect.

Mr. EATON. I was giving my judgment, my own conviction.

Mr. BLAINE. We are then in the fog still.

Mr. EATON. Well, you may be there.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator cannot give us any assurance of what we may expect.

Mr. EATON. I should like to get my friend out of the fog; but he is hopelessly in the fog.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish the honorable Senator would get the country out of the fog.

Mr. EATON. We are trying to get it out.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not think that the evil that has been done to this country by publications like the one I referred to from Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS has yet been measured. I do not think the evil that has been done to the southern country by the school-books in the hands of their children has been measured. Many of the books put into the hands of the rising generation of the South are tinctured all through with prejudice and misrepresentation and with a spirit of hatred.

We are accused by our friends on the opposite side of the Chamber of stirring up strife and generating hatred. I do not believe it would be possible to find in all the literature of the North for the schools and for the young a solitary paragraph intended or calculated to arouse hatred or suggest unpatriotic feelings toward any portion of the Union. A large portion of the South has been furnished with special school-books calculated for the meridian, with the facts appended to suit that particular locality. It was said that for two generations a large portion of the English people believed that the American colonies had never achieved their independence but had been kicked off as a useless appendage to the British Empire, and that they were glad to be rid of us. There is a large number of the school children in the South who are educated with radically wrong notions and radically erroneous facts. I saw an arithmetic that was filled with examples—think of putting politics into an arithmetic—such as this: If ten cowardly Yankees had so many miles the start, and five brave confederates were following them, the first going at so many miles an hour, and the others following at so many miles an hour, how long before the Yankees would be overtaken? Now think of putting that deliberately in a school-book and having school histories made up on that basis for children. I have here from a gentleman who, I believe, is a man of high position, an extract which is so pertinent that I desire to read it. It is from an address before the literary societies of the Virginia University, by Mr. John S. Preston, a gentleman of distinction, I believe, in the State of South Carolina. I want to read this merely to put it on record to show the pabulum on which the southern mind feeds:

The Mayflower freight under the laws of England was heresy and crime. The Jamestown emigrant was an English freeman, loyal to his country and his God, with England's honor in his heart and English piety in his soul, and carrying in his right hand the charters, usages, and the laws which were achieving the regeneration of England. * * * These two people spoke the same language, and nominally read the same Bible; but like the offspring of the Syrian princes, they were two manner of people, and they could not coalesce or commune. Their feud began beyond the broad Atlantic, and has never ceased on its western shores. Not space, or time, or the convenience of any human law, or the power of any human arm, can reconcile institutions for the turbulent fanatic of Plymouth Rock and the God-fearing Christian of Jamestown. You may assign them to the closest territorial proximity, with all the forms, modes, and shows of civilization; but you can never cement them into the bonds of brotherhood. Great nature, in her supremest law, forbids it. Territorial localization drove them to a hollow and unnatural armistice in effecting their segregation from England—the one for the lucre of traffic, the other to obtain a more perfect law of liberty; the one to destroy foreign tea, the other to drive out foreign tyrants; the one to offer thanksgiving for the fruit of the earth, the other to celebrate the gift of grace by the birth of Christ.

I know the piety of New England has sometimes been criticised, but I never before heard of such fervent zeal among the Jamestown emigrants.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the date of that?

Mr. BLAINE. I think in 1875 or 1876. Does the Senator from South Carolina think that is enough to establish a statute of limitations?

Mr. BUTLER. I say nothing about it.

Mr. MORGAN. May I be allowed a word?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not seen all these arithmetics or school histories either to which the Senator from Maine refers. I doubt very much their existence, unless the Senator has them present to prove the fact. I refer now to those published since the war.

Mr. BLAINE. I refer only to those published since the war.

Mr. MORGAN. There is some other literature, however, in the Southern States which I will call the attention of the Senator from Maine to, that perhaps would indicate that there was some necessity for counter proceedings for the purpose of infusing the minds of the people down there with correct ideas on political questions. I hold in my hand the "minutes of the twelfth session of the Alabama conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, held at Mobile, Alabama, in Emanual church, December 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22, 1878, Right Reverend Bishop J. P. Campbell, D. D., LL. D., president." He is a colored man, and a very learned man I am told. On page 13 of the minutes of that conference I find the following entry:

Committee on letters and petitions:

First. Complaint against Z. Taylor, of Birmingham, for voting democratic ticket, signed by United States marshal.

The decision was:

His case out of jurisdiction of this conference; belongs to North Alabama conference. [Laughter.]

I have no comment to make upon that.

Mr. BLAINE. That begins to show me that the claim for piety in the South that Mr. Preston makes has some foundation. [Laughter.] If they begin to bring up men before church conferences for voting the democratic, State-rights, secession ticket, I think it is good evidence of reform. [Laughter.] It gives some ground of patriotic hope for the future.

I have here also a speech delivered by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, the junior Senator from that State, [Mr. HAMPTON,] before the Historical Society, I believe, of the South, and this has arrested my attention. Of course I read it in no spirit of captious or personal criticism, but as a great public document; and if what I read means anything, it means a great deal:

LESSONS FROM HISTORY.

These are the lessons our children should learn from their mothers. Nor are these the only ones which should be inculcated, for the pages of history furnish many which should not be overlooked. These teach in the clearest and most emphatic manner, that there is always hope for a people who cherish the spirit of freedom, who will not tamely give up their rights, and who, amid all the changes of time, the trials of adversity, remain steadfast to their convictions that liberty is their birthright.

* * * * * * *

THE SOUTH COMPARED TO PRUSSIA AND THE NORTH TO FRANCE.

When Napoleon in that wonderful campaign of Jena, struck down in a few weeks the whole military strength of Prussia, destroyed that army with which the great Frederick had held at bay the combined forces of Europe, and crushed out, apparently forever, the liberties, seemingly the very existence of that great state, but one hope of her disenthrallment and regeneration was left her—the unconquered and unconquerable patriotism of her sons. As far as human foresight could penetrate the future, this hope appeared but a vain and delusive one; yet only a few years passed before her troops turned the scale of victory of Waterloo, and the treaty of Paris atoned in part for the mortification of that of Tilsit.

* * * * * * *

She educated her children by a system which made them good citizens in peace and formidable soldiers in war; she kindled and kept alive the sacred fire of patriotism; she woke the slumbering spirit of the Fatherland; and what has been the result of this self-devotion of a whole people for half a century? Single-handed she has just met her old antagonist. The shame of her defeats of yore has been wiped out by glorious victories; the contributions extorted from her have been more than repaid; her insults have been avenged, and her victorious eagles, sweeping over the broken lilies of her enemy, waved in triumph from the walls of conquered Paris, while she dictated peace to prostrate and humbled France. Is not the moral to be drawn from this noble dedication of a people to the interests and honor of their country worth remembering?

Hungary in her recent struggle to throw off the yoke of Austria was crushed to the earth, and yet to-day the Hungarians as citizens of Austria exercise a controlling power in that great empire.

I say, if that means anything, it means a great deal. If that means anything at all, it means the education of the rising generation of the South for another conflict; it means that or else it is vapid and idle rhetoric. And I say again, Mr. President, that throughout the length and breadth of the South the one evil omen of to-day is the literature that is given to the children and the intellectual food that is offered to all the young and the rising men in the institutions of learning, in their academies, their colleges, their universities——

Mr. HAMPTON. May I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. With great pleasure.

Mr. HAMPTON. The words which he has done me the honor to quote do not mean what he is pleased to call another rebellion. If it is "idle and vapid rhetoric," I admit that it is not such rhetoric as he pours out; but if it is vapid and idle rhetoric I have only to plead guilty to the charge when made by him.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator speaks of a revival of a power that was once conquered, to be victorious at another Waterloo, with a crowning peace in Paris to atone for the humiliation of Tilsit—if that means anything by analogy at all, it has a deep and far-reaching significance.

Mr. HAMPTON.

Peace hath her victories
No less renown'd than war.

Mr. BLAINE. But peace does not celebrate her victories on the plains of Waterloo. That is where war celebrates its triumphs. Peace does not celebrate itself by great armed hosts that are employed and marshaled for avenging insult, to which the honorable Senator called attention. That is not the language of peace, and without the slightest intention to say anything discourteous, I say it is mere rhetoric—I leave out the adjective—it is mere rhetoric, or it is a prodigious menace. It is the one or the other.

As to the pending bill, I need only to say that the laws proposed to be repealed are precisely the kind which Mr. Webster alluded to when he addressed Mr. Calhoun; laws that have received the sanction of Congress and been for years on the statute-book. They are there properly. They have secured justice; they have assured fair and equal elections; they ought to be upheld; and to this hour not one solitary reason has been shown for their repeal, with the single exception of a desire to grasp partisan power. It all moves in one direction. Every step has been taken since the democratic party got into power in the House and in the Senate in one direction, and that direction has been to the striking down of the Federal power and the exaltation of the State power. This measure is but one. Others have gone before it; others are to follow it. What may be their fate I do not know. We on this side will resist by every constitutional means, and you on that side, despite the threats of the Senator from Connecticut, will be obliged to submit in the end, and the power of this Government will not be put down by a threat; it will not be put down by a combination; it will not be put down by a political party. It was not put down by a rebellion. It can meet another, either in the form of organized resistance in withholding supplies or in the more serious form which the language of the Senator from South Carolina seemed to foreshadow. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order in the galleries.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, before entering upon the remarks which I propose to make I am requested to say, and that request accords with my own inclination in the matter, that the school literature referred to by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is non-existent in the Southern States. During the war there was some literature of that kind prevalent, but even then it met with little favor, and I am assured that since the war no child, white or black, in the Southern States has ever seen any such literature.

And now, Mr. President, it seems to be the peculiar misfortune of the section from which I come, and I believe it to be also the misfortune of the whole country, that no question in any way pertaining to the South or originating with any representative from the South has been able to obtain a fair hearing in these Halls upon its merits. Indeed it would seem as if the day for that kind of discussion had passed away forever. I had been taught to believe that the object of all discussion was to elicit truth, and not only was it useless but such discussion was mischievous if that was not the object to be attained. If this indeed be so, I might appeal with confidence to every fair-minded man in the United States who hears or reads our debates here and ask if the discussion of the questions now before the Senate has been fairly or logically handled with the view to ascertain the truth. It is proposed—

First. By the legislation which is now in part before us and which has been, to repeal the laws under which authority is assumed to interfere with the elections of the country by the use of the military.

Second. To repeal the laws by which the United States marshals and supervisors were authorized to control the elections of the country.

Third. To repeal the law requiring jurors in the Federal courts to take the test oath.

Now, these are the questions, plain and simple, which have engaged the attention of the American Congress and the people for the last three months. Common sense and a decent regard for the public interest require that they should receive at our hands the calmest and most dispassionate consideration which it is in our power to bestow upon them; that they should be abstracted and dissociated from every local passion or prejudice and viewed solely with regard to their effect upon the public welfare. Has this been done? The record of our proceedings is evidence that it has not. The staple of the arguments in opposition has been as wide of this object as it is possible for human imagination to conceive. One Senator, as his argument, cries out rebellion; another cries out secession; another exclaims, with alarm, that rebel soldiers are here in these Halls; another claims that the North pays the larger part of the direct taxes, and nearly all of the taxes collected on imports; another sees a goblin in the shape of a democratic caucus; another holds up his hands in holy horror in contemplating the fact that there is absolutely a democratic majority in both branches of Congress; and yet another sees ruin in a solid South; and last, but not least, one Senator exclaims in the famine of argument, "Jefferson Davis;" and that is the contribution that he furnishes to the literature of the country.

These various and logical appeals have not even the merit that the old negro groom attributed to John Minor Bott's race-horses; for when taunted with the fact that his horses could not beat anything, he congratulated himself that at all events they could beat each other! These apologies for arguments cannot even beat each other in absurdity. An honest judge will be compelled to decide that the race is a drawn one and all bets are off.

If our proceedings, Mr. President, were in the nature of a complaint and answer there is not a court in the land but would be compelled to order that the answers put in here by the republican defendants to these bills be stricken out as frivolous, and that a judgment be rendered in favor of the plaintiffs. I will not recapitulate the arguments in favor of these bills. They are before the country, and will be properly judged of in due season. I desire only to make a few observations in reply to these sectional appeals.

Mr. President, who made the South solid? The answer is as plain and unmistakable as it is possible to make anything to the human intellect: the republican party is responsible for this thing. At the beginning of the late war almost the entire whig party of the South, with a large and influential portion of the democratic, were in favor of the Union and deprecated with their whole souls the attempt at its destruction, but through love of their native States and sympathy with their kindred and neighbors they were drawn into the support of the war. What became of them after the war? Their wisdom in opposing it was justified by the ruinous results; their patriotism and courage were highly appreciated, and when peace came this class were in high favor at the South, while the secessionists as the original advocates of a disastrous policy were down in public estimation.

If you gentlemen of the North had then come forward with liberal terms and taken these men by the hand, you would have established a party in the South that would have perpetuated your power in this Government for a generation, provided you had listened to the views of those men and respected their policy on questions touching their section. But you pursued the very opposite course; a course which compelled almost every decent, intelligent man of Anglo-Saxon prejudices and traditions to take a firm and determined stand against you; a course which consolidated all shades of political opinion into one resolute mass to defend what they conceived to be their ancient forms of government, laws, liberties, and civilization itself. By confiscation and the destruction of war, you had already stripped us of property to the extent of at least $3,000,000,000, and left our land desolate, rent, and torn, our homes consumed with fire and our pleasant places a wasted wilderness.

Peace then came—no, not peace, but the end of war came—no, not the end of war, but the end of legitimate, civilized war; and for three years you dallied with us. One day we were treated as though we were in the Union and as though we had legitimate State governments in operation; another day we were treated as though we were out of the Union and our State governments were rebellious usurpations. It was the regular game of "Now you see it, and now you don't." We were in the Union for all purposes of oppression, we were out of it for all purposes of protection. Finally, seeing that we still remained democratic, the Union was dissolved by act of Congress and we were formally legislated outside in order that you might bring us into the Union again in such a way as to guarantee us a republican form of government; that is, that we should vote the republican ticket; and you cited article 4, section 4, of the Constitution as your authority to do this. You deposed our State governments and ejected from office every official from governor to township constable, and remitted us to a state of chaos in which the only light of human authority for the regulation of human affairs and the control of human passions was that which gleamed from the polished point of the soldier's bayonet. Under this simple and easily comprehended system of jurisprudence so consonant to the great assertion of the great Declaration, that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," you began and completed the task of guaranteeing to us a "republican" form of government. You disfranchised at least 10 per cent. of our citizens, embracing the wisest, best, and most experienced. You enfranchised our slaves, the lowest and most ignorant; and you placed over them as leaders a class of men who have attained to the highest positions of infamy known to modern ages.

In order to preserve the semblance of consent, conventions were called to form new constitutions, the delegates to which were chosen by this new and unheard-of constituency. The military counted the votes, often at the headquarters in distant States, the general in command determining the election and qualifications of the delegates. Many of these delegates were negroes, on whom the right to vote and hold office had not yet been bestowed. They framed constitutions in which they gave themselves this right, and it was submitted for ratification to the same constituency who chose the delegates, and none other—that is to say, they propounded the question whether they should vote and hold office to themselves, and decided this question by their own votes, while white men were not permitted to vote. Perhaps the annals of the race from which we spring, with all its various branches spread throughout the world, cannot furnish such a parody upon the principles of free government based upon the consent of the governed.

These constitutions were declared adopted by the general in command. Perhaps they were adopted. And at the same election, so called, were also chosen State officers for a long term of years, and chosen by the same constituency. The new governments went to work, and in the short space of four years they plundered those eleven Southern States to the extent of $262,000,000; that is to say, they took all that we had that was amenable to larceny, and they would have taken more doubtless, but for the same reason that the weather could not get any colder in Minnesota, as described by a returned emigrant from that State, "because the thermometer was too short." [Laughter.] And now recalling these facts and a hundred more which I cannot now name, can any candid man wonder that we became solid? Can he wonder that old whigs and democrats, Union men and secessionists, should unite in a desperate effort to throw off the dominion of a party which had inflicted these things upon them? And your military interference, your abuse, and your denunciation continue unto this day.

Can you wonder that your following in that country has dwindled into insignificance? The negro alone is your friend there and a very few whites, and his eyes, blinded as they have been, are steadily opening to the great truth which you ought to have taught him, that his prosperity and welfare are inseparably connected with that of his white neighbors. One by one the northern adventurers who led them have packed their carpet-bags and silently stolen back to the slums of northern society whence they originated, and the lonely native republican makes his solitary lair in some custom-house or post-office or revenue headquarters. The broad, free, bright world outside of these retreats in all the South is democratic, thanks to you the republican party of the North. It would be well enough for republican leaders to remember that the inflexible law of compensation exists in politics as well as in all things else. If we violate the laws of health we suffer bodily pains or early dissolution; if we violate the laws of society we suffer in public esteem; if we violate the laws of man we are subject to its pains and penalties; if we violate the laws of God we will suffer the penalties of sin; if we violate the laws of nature we can reap none of the benefits which our knowledge of them now enables us to derive therefrom. So it is in politics. You outraged all of our sensibilities in your treatment of us and we naturally became your political enemies. There is no impunity for transgression.

You now affect to treat the presence of representative southern men in these Halls as both an intrusion and a calamity, and the tone of your speeches will induce an intelligent stranger sitting in these galleries for the last three months to believe that you were sorry you had spent so much blood and treasure to force the South back into the Union. Is this really true? Do you regret that the proper sentiment of society in the South is represented here? And rather than this should be, would you prefer that the South had staid where she tried to go? I hope not. For the sake of your patriotism I hope not. Had you rather that the Union had been lost than that you should lose power? Was it the Union you fought for or was it political supremacy? Notwithstanding the wild blasts of alarm which you are sounding throughout the length and breadth of this vast country, you well know that the only danger which our presence here indicates is the danger of your being ousted from political power. In what way can the democracy injure this country? What motive have we to injure it? Having surrendered the doctrine of secession and abandoned any intention whatsoever to divide this Union, how could we expect that the democracy to which we belong could obtain and hold the control of the Government except by showing the people by our acts that we are patriotically desirous of promoting its welfare and its glory. But you say you distrust these expressions. My friends, in your hearts you do not. On the contrary, a man who has offered his blood once for his plighted faith you believe when he plights his faith again. There is not a southern rebel, no matter how bitter and rampant he may have been, that you have not received with arms wide spread and rewarded with offices of honor and trust, who came to you with craven repentance on his tongue, ready to vote the republican ticket and eating dirt with the same gluttonous appetite with which he once ate fire. You profess to believe him, but you despise him in your hearts. You are not alarmed to receive him and you cast no suspicions upon his professions of sincerity, though, as has more than once happened, he asks you to believe he tells the truth to-day because he told a lie yesterday.

Mr. President, it has seemed to me not a little hard and inhospitable that southern Senators whose States were forced back into the Union should be so often twitted with their presence on this floor. We are here in obedience to the Constitution and the Union, and if I recollect aright some of the Senators on this floor came to the South to invite us back into these Halls. And I have a distinct recollection that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] came all the way down to North Carolina to invite that State to send Senators here, and they came attended with such a numerous retinue and were so urgent in their solicitation that I, for one, found it impossible to resist so weighty an invitation. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. When I got here I did not find you. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANCE. But I came as soon as I could. [Laughter.] The honorable Senator found me, and he would not open the door for me after he had invited me. [Laughter.]

Now that we are here the Senator from Illinois complains of our presence, and the Senator from New York accuses us of wishing to "dominate" at the feast to which we have been invited, and says that we are like McGregor, who claimed that the head of the table was wherever he sat. For one I disclaim all desire to dominate at the feast, unless, indeed, voting for democratic measures be domination. I do desire, however, to be equally honored with the other guests. And I desire, in vindication also of the good name and rude hospitality of McGregor, to say that in my opinion he would have been the last man in all Scotland, riever and cattle-lifter as he was, to invite a man into his house and up to his board and then denounce him for being there.

Mr. President, would there be any real danger to the best interests of this country if it were again under the complete control of the democratic party? Surely not. It is history that this country owes its chief glory and development in the past to that grand historic party. But for its sagacity and patriotism it is safe to say that we would still be a feeble and inconsiderable people. The democratic party have extended the boundaries of this Republic from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean. Its policy acquired the territory of Louisiana, which extended from the Gulf of Mexico up the Father of Waters to the British Dominion, embracing Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, Kansas, and all that vast region west to the Rocky Mountains. It acquired Florida, Texas, New Mexico, California, including their grand extent of country, plains, rivers, and mountains, with all their wealth of gold and silver and precious metals, embracing more than a million of square miles. As I now remember, not a single foot of land has been added to the empire by the republican party except Alaska—a broad stretch of icy waste, a land where frozen earth contends with frozen water, inhabited by seals and savages, in a climate which I have heard described as nine months of winter and three months of damnation cold weather. [Laughter.]

In addition to this territorial wealth and power which democracy has given to the Republic, its great lawyers and magnificent statesmen have in all generations of our existence been the special champions and expounders of the Constitution—the bond of our Union and the very ark of the covenant of our liberties. They have striven to have its principles understood, its provisions maintained in their purity, and its blessings extended to all; and great as their services have been in enlarging our boundaries, spreading our commerce, and elevating our diplomacy abroad, their services to our people and to mankind in the exaltation of constitutional principles more entitle them to the confidence of American citizens than all things else put together. In addition to their services in maintaining the Constitution they have in the main been the chief promoters of public economy and the enemies of corruption. Under democratic rule there has been in this country no Credit Mobilier, there has been no Black Friday, no Sanborn contracts, no robbery of freedmen's savings banks, no Belknap, no returning boards and no electoral commission; no military interference at the polls, no test oath for jurors in the United States courts, no Federal spies and overseers when the people were choosing their rulers. And now that we are seeking to restore this state of things and to bring back the Government to the paths in which our fathers trod the attempt is denounced as revolutionary and the trumpet is blown to warn the country that the end of all things is about to come, when, as we trust, nothing is about to come to an end except the domination of the republican party.

Coming briefly to the real questions, I ask why should the law authorizing the military to be used at the polls not be repealed and why should the law authorizing Federal supervision also be not repealed? I take it to be indisputably established without further argument, that the whole subject relating to the elective franchise is placed by the Constitution under the control of the States, and all that the Federal Government can do is to see that the States, as such, do not discriminate against any on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This is the whole duty and power of Congress as declared by the Supreme Court. When any republican Senator has ventured for one moment to abandon the line of inflamatory appeal to the sectional feeling of the country, the excuses given for the retention of this law upon the statute-book are illogical almost to puerility.

One Senator gravely urges that it should not be repealed because the great bulk of the Army is in the distant West, only some few hundreds being east of the Rocky Mountains. He tells us in the course of his enumeration that there are only about thirty in the State of North Carolina, and asks the Senators from that State if they are afraid of that number of soldiers. Passing over the obvious fact that within thirty days ten thousand could be sent there if desired, I answer that we do fear them, because they represent the power of the United States Government and the enmity of the republican party which wields that power; we fear them as the Hollander fears the first small leak in the dikes which bear back the waves of the ocean from deluging the meadows of his homestead; we fear them as the physician fears the first speck of gangrene in the system of his patient; we fear them as the sailor fears the piling up of the storm clouds upon the horizon, knowing that their deceptive beauty covers the fierce desolation of the tempest; we fear them as the shepherd of the mountain fears for his lambs at even the flitting of a shadow athwart his path, for he knows it to be the shadow of the eagle, the remorseless tyrant of the air; we fear them as Charlemagne feared the rude wooden ships of the Norse Vikings on their first appearance in the seas of his empire; we fear them as all patriotic Romans feared the crossing of the Rubicon by Cæsar, the passage of which with arms in his hand marked him as the enemy of Roman liberty.

Even so we fear and believe that when an American Executive crosses the Rubicon of his constitutional powers and appears at the place of choosing our rulers, armed either with the sword or with illegal powers of arrest, he thereby proclaims himself the enemy of the liberties of our people. A flagrant illustration of the justice of this fear is to be found in the various orders of the War Department directing the concentration of troops in the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana on the occasion of the election of 1876. The excuse that these soldiers were not intended to interfere with elections or to be placed at the polls, but only to be sufficiently near to keep the peace, is not sustained by the facts of that reign of military violence, nor will it be if tried again. I quote from an order dated headquarters Department of the South, Columbia, South Carolina, October 8, 1876, issued by General Ruger:

Should the barracks or camp in any case be so far from the place of voting that prompt assistance could not on occasion arising be rendered the civil officers, the commanding officer will so place his command or a sufficient part thereof that such assistance if required may be promptly given. No troops, however, will be placed actually at any poll of election except upon requirement to that effect by the marshal or his deputy.

So it seems that the discretion as to whether the law should be violated or not was vested in a deputy marshal! In fact they were so illegally disposed and used, in a hundred instances. The President, as appears by the order of General Townsend to General Emory, dated October 27, 1874, seemed anxious to have the troops placed at the polls without the appearance of doing so. In that order he propounds a physical problem or conundrum to General Emory which that officer had to give up. He says:

Cannot points be selected near polls where attempts to overawe voters, likely to result in riots, may be made, and troops stationed there a day or two beforehand? It would not be desirable to have soldiers at or too near the polls, as all appearance of military interference, except to secure voters their right to vote, should be avoided.

Not to "keep the peace," mind you, but to secure voters their right to vote! Now, this was a hard problem: to place troops so far from the polls as to avoid all appearance of interference with the elections, and yet so near as to actually interfere by securing all men in their right to vote. Quod est demonstrandum. It was too much for General Emory—in fact, it was too much for common sense and common honesty. All these orders show a palpable and shameless determination on the part of the Executive to control both the elections and the counting of the votes of presidential electors, as well as the organization of State governments. The manner in which the troops were shifted about from one to the other of these three States, on which the presidential election depended, exhibits the animus of this infamous transaction in a manner so plain that the wayfaring man, though a republican, need not err therein.

But the President tells us in his veto message that there has been no interference during his administration, and promises that there shall be none. So we are to take his royal promise to respect the people's liberties and not to have them secured by law? Here is the promise of one President of the United States, and one who stands exceedingly high in republican estimation, dated November 10, 1876, to General W. T. Sherman, Washington, District of Columbia:

Instruct General Auger, in Louisiana, and General Ruger, in Florida, to be vigilant with the force at their command to preserve peace and good order, and to see that the proper and legal boards of canvassers are unmolested in the performance of their duties. Should there be any grounds of suspicion of fraudulent counting on either side it should be reported and denounced at once. No man worthy of the office of President would be willing to hold the office if counted in, placed there by fraud. Either party can afford to be disappointed in the result, but the country cannot afford to have the result tainted by the suspicion of illegal or false returns.

U. S. GRANT.

On the same day the following telegram is also forwarded to General Sherman:

The President thinks, and I agree with him, that it will be well for you to give to the Associated Press his telegram and mine to you, referring to affairs now in the South.

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

Of the vast, open-jawed, and cavernous-bellied nature of this promise I have not the heart or the time to discourse. I shall content myself with imitating the discretion of Mr. Rodman, who, returning home one night full of tax-paid, and fearing that his speech would betray him, to the many questions of his wife for a long while maintained an obstinate silence, until at length to end the matter he solemnly remarked, "Mrs. Rodman, you know I am a man of few words, and now I am plumb done talking." That subject immediately became res adjudicata. I am done talking on this subject so well calculated to make an American citizen blush.

The arguments made by the opponents of these bills, especially those of the veto messages, strike me with a good deal of amazement. To illustrate their absurdity let us frame them into the semblance of mathematical propositions, thus:

Proposition first: Theorem.—The troops of the United States are two thousand miles away on the frontier and could not be used to control elections if they were wanted.—Senator from Maine.

The troops could not be so used if they were here, as the law forbids it. I promise not to use them.—The President.

Hence it is revolutionary and dangerous to liberty and the purity of elections to pass this bill forbidding such use of troops.—Q. E. D.

Corollary first.—The necessity for troops at the polls to secure fair elections is in proportion to the squares of the distance of their present location, i. e., the greater the distance, the greater the necessity.

Corollary second.—The necessity for the presence of troops at the polls is also in proportion to the legal inability to use them if they were present, and if the President is determined not to use them at all to control elections, then the necessity becomes absolute.

Corollary third.—The revolutionary and dangerous character of a law consists in the fact that it is useless, there being already in existence laws sufficient to effect the purpose.

Scholium.—In the above it is assumed axiomatically that the terms "liberty" and "purity of elections" are synonymous with the term "republican party." [Prolonged laughter.]

Proposition second: Theorem.—The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.—The fifteenth amendment quoted by the President.

The Supreme Court in the United States against Cruikshank, and in Myers vs. Happersett, have declared that the only right guaranteed by this amendment is the right that citizens shall not be discriminated against on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Hence "national legislation to provide safeguards for free and honest elections is necessary, as experience has shown, not only to secure the right to vote to the enfranchised race at the South, but also to prevent fraudulent voting in the large cities of the North."—The President.

Corollary first.—It follows that if John Smith gets drunk at an election in North Carolina and punches a negro's head he immediately, by presidential logic, becomes the State of North Carolina embodied in the flesh, and he, or it, discriminates against the said negro within the meaning of the Constitution and the guarantee is called for at once.

Corollary second.—If it be a white man whose head is punched by the embodied State-of-John-Smith-North-Carolina it is a discrimination all the same, provided the said white man was about to vote or had voted the republican ticket, that being the true meaning and interpretation of the words "race, color, and previous condition of servitude."

Corollary third.—It follows necessarily, that if a New York repeater vote the democratic ticket five times in one day, he becomes likewise the great State of New York (including the Senator) or, e converso, the great State of New York becomes the repeater, and by so voting he discriminates (the Lord knows how) against the right of somebody (the Lord knows who) to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and the only avenue opened up by which this guarantee can be enforced is to send in the Army and Johnny Davenport. [Laughter.]

Scholium.—The "previous condition" referred to in the foregoing is that of republicanism, and implies also present condition; that is, being a republican.

Scholium second.—Enforcing the right to vote by soldiers is not an "interference with elections."

Scholium third.—This doctrine of "discrimination" does not apply to the State of Rhode Island, where a white man's right to vote may be freely abridged on account of his present condition of impecuniosity.

Proposition third: Theorem—"The practice of tacking to appropriation bills measures not pertinent to such bills did not prevail until more than forty years after the adoption of the Constitution. It has become a common practice. All parties when in power have adopted it. The public welfare will be promoted in many ways by a return to the early practice of the Government and the true principles of legislation."—The President.

Hence the practice of tacking legislation to appropriation bills having been practiced by all parties for more than fifty years, it should be immediately abandoned when disagreeable to the President or inconvenient to the party, its antiquity not being sufficient to justify it, though greater than the period of its non-use.

Corollary first.—It follows, therefore, that the practice of using troops at the polls, which did not prevail for more than seventy-five years after the adoption of the Constitution, should now become of general and indispensable use; fourteen years being amply sufficient time to legalize it, and it being now absolutely necessary for the preservation of the republican party.

Scholium.—For the purposes of the next presidential election fourteen years of military interference are equal to seventy-five years of free and unrestrained elections, on the well-established principle "that circumstances alter cases." (The Lawyer's Bull vs. the Farmer's Ox, 1 Webster's El. Spell.)

N. B.—It is said on high authority that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of State once held this problem unsound, but were coerced into assenting to it by party necessity. But quien sabe! [Laughter.]

So much for the absurd deductions which may be logically drawn from the premises contained in the veto messages and the arguments of Senators.

Now, Mr. President, why should not the peace at the polls and the purity of elections be intrusted to the authority, the virtue, and the patriotism of the States, where alone our fathers placed it? Is it because the States are unable with their civil machinery to preserve the peace? They have invariably proven able in the past except in cases of such unusual violence as is contemplated in the Constitution, article 4, section 4. Are they unwilling? Surely they are willing to preserve their autonomy and perpetuate their own existence. Are they corrupt? Surely if their inhabitants as citizens of the States are too corrupt for self-government, it is not possible that their virtue should be improved and their corruptions cease the moment they are invested with authority by the United States. On the contrary there is always found less of responsibility and more of corruption in aggregated than in separate communities. How can a corrupt State officer become an incorruptible Federal officer?

To suppose that the States are either unable, unwilling, or too corrupt to hold peaceful and honest elections is to declare unmistakably that the people thereof are incapable of self-government. "Let each Senator have written on his brow what he thinks of the Republic," said the Senator from New York, quoting the old Roman. So say I. Let each Senator say for himself what he thinks of his State; are its people incapable of self-government, of choosing their rulers peaceably and honestly? For one I can say with unspeakable pride and with absolute truth that the people of the State of North Carolina who sent me here are able, willing, and virtuous enough to fulfill these and all the other high functions of free government; that they have ever done so since the keels of Raleigh's ships first grated upon the white sands of her shores; and God helping them, they and their children will continue to do so, if not destroyed by centralization, until chaos shall come again. It is with extreme sadness that I hear any other Senator intimate that it is not so with his people.

Mr. President, did you ever consider for a moment the manifold and extraordinary uses to which we are subjecting the soldiers? And did you ever think that all this means in fact the failure of the civil authority, that our liberties are declining more and more as we employ force? Sir, in the uses to which we put the soldiers I am reminded of what I read about the bamboo in Asiatic countries. It is said the natives do almost everything with that wonderful arborescent grass. When young and tender it is eaten and preserved; it is made into houses and boats, astronomical instruments, ornamental work, yards of vessels, aqueducts, rain-cloaks, water-wheels, fence-ropes, chairs, tables, hats, and umbrellas, fans, pipes, cups, shields, tool-handles, lamp-wicks, paper, knives, and a hundred other things. In this way it seems to me that we are forsaking the civil functions of our institutions and utilizing the soldier.

In addition to their legitimate business as defenders of the country, we have made of them governors of States, legislators, organizers of Legislatures and judges of the election and qualifications of the members thereof, judges of law and equity and of the criminal courts, policemen, sheriffs, marshals and deputy marshals, revenue officers and still-house hunters, managers of railroads, controllers of churches and of schools, justices of the peace, supervisors of election, mathematicians to see a fair count, protectors of witnesses, foster-fathers of returning boards, and, above all, as republican propagandists. In the language of the sewing-machine companies, "no family should be without one," [laughter;] this republican political bamboo. Is there not great danger? Does it not indicate the decay and the disuse of the civil arm of the law, which is the natural and only safe protector of our liberties? Let us, sir, discard this miserable bamboo policy and cease to make the soldier our political maid of all work.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the position of the republican party in reference to the use of soldiers and supervisors at the polls, on the pretense of preserving the peace and securing free elections, is the most remarkable one that reasonable men ever assumed. It may be formulated thus: the elections shall be free if we have to surround the polls with bayonets; the elections shall be according to the laws of the States if we have to overawe the civil magistrates and State officials by an exhibition of power; the elections shall be pure if it takes Davenport and all the convicted criminals and occupants of all the dens of infamy in our great cities to manage them; the election shall be unforced and without the appearance of violence if a battery of artillery has to be trained on every ballot-box in the land; and lastly, the election shall be fair if we have to arrest without warrant and imprison without bail, until the elections are over, every man who offers to vote the democratic ticket.

The speeches of republican Senators mean this, the vetoes of the President mean this, and they mean more than this, Mr. President—in effect they say that unless we can use the Army at the polls we will let that Army dissolve, we will leave our forts and arsenals ungarrisoned, we will strip the frontiers of all protection and let the men, women, and children of that border country be slaughtered and scalped, and the unchecked savage extend his barbarous sway over all that land of promise, once more remitted to its ancient wildness. We will not only do this but we will denounce the democratic members of Congress who offered us the money to support this Army as the authors of this disaster. All these things will we do rather than lose our chances to count in the next President, and we will cover the facts and obscure the logic of the case by reinflaming the bitter prejudices of the war in the hearts of our constituents! Can it be possible to do this? Is there to be no end to passion, no restoration of reason? We shall see.

I confess that I do not believe these absurd methods of dealing with the American mind can much longer prevail. I regard them as the desperate efforts of a sinking party, and I believe the people will so regard them. I have been much touched by the affectionate warnings given us by the other side that we were ruining ourselves in trying to repeal these laws. The kind-hearted Senator from Michigan notified us frankly that if we persisted we would go down into the waters of oblivion to rise no more forever. He did not even give us a chance at the general resurrection. [Laughter.] It seemed to distress him, and if I thought it was true prophecy I would freely mingle my tears with his at the contemplation of so dire a calamity. Candor compels me, however, to acknowledge that I cannot reciprocate his charity. If I thought the republican party were standing upon the brink of a precipice, beneath which seethed those cold waters of oblivion, instead of warning them I pledge you my word I would try to induce them to step over the edge—in fact, I might lend them a push. [Laughter.] At least I should feel as indifferent about it as the lodger at an inn did, who was awakened in the night when the meteors were falling, and told that the day of judgment had come. "Well, well," said he, testily, "tell the landlord about it; I am only a boarder." [Laughter.]

And now, Mr. President, if the breath was about to leave my body and I was permitted to say but one word as to what my country most needed, that word should be, Rest! Rest from strife, rest from sectional conflict, rest from sectional bitterness, rest from inflammatory appeals, rest from this constant, most unwise, and unprofitable agitation. Rest in all lands and in all literature is used as the symbol of the most perfect state of felicity which mankind can attain in this world and the next. "And the land had rest," said the old Hebrew chroniclers in describing the reign of their good kings; "and his rest shall be glorious," says the prophet Isaiah in foretelling the coming of our Lord, when Ephraim should have ceased to envy Judah and Judah should have ceased to vex Ephraim.

Heaven itself is described as rest—a place "where the weary are at rest." "There remaineth therefore a rest for the people of God," saith the apostle. Can we not give this rest to our people? I know, Mr. President, that those from whom I come desire it above their chief joy. The excitement through which they have passed for the last twenty years, the suffering and the sorrow, the calamity, public and private, which they have undergone have filled their hearts with indescribable yearnings for national peace, for a complete moral as well as physical restoration of the Union. There is one policy, and but one, to effect this object, and that is the policy of conciliation, of restoration, so steadily pursued by the democratic statesmen and people of the North. It is the only true statesmanship for our condition, the only genuine remedy for the hard times with which we are afflicted. Nature everywhere teaches it, and her thousand agencies, silent and mysterious, constantly inculcate it, even as day unto day uttereth speech and night unto night showeth knowledge. Cross this noble river which flows by our capital and search for the battle-fields of blood-watered Virginia. You scarce can find them. Dense forests of young saplings cover all the hills and plains that were so lately swept bare by marching and encamping armies. "For there is hope of a tree if it be cut down that it will sprout again, and the tender branch thereof will not cease." Waving seas of wheat cover the open fields so lately plowed by the bursting shells while charging battalions met in deadly shock; and green grass has so covered the lines of intrenchment as to give them all the seeming of the cunning farmer ditches. Restoration is nature's law. Let us imitate her. God of all mercy and grace, may not these gaping wounds of civil war be permitted to heal, if they will?

Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. LOGAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to make a speech or to detain the Senate more than a moment. We have been highly entertained by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] and I will not, of course, attempt at this late hour to inflict a speech on the Senate, but I desire, in answer to the general declaration that has been made on the other side of the Chamber at various times that the democratic party had never resorted to the use of the Army at elections, to read a paragraph or two from a speech made in the House of Representatives, March 17, 1858:

I say, then, that the President of the United States has power to use the Army in certain specified cases; and I am not prepared to say that such a case has not arisen in the Territory of Kansas. I know the President, in his discretion, thought it had arisen. I know the governor whom he sent there thought it had arisen. I know the result of their use there has been good. Not one drop of blood has been shed. No man has been interfered with in the enjoyment of his civil rights; and for the first time in the history of that Territory the two political parties have met at an election upon an issue joined, and have conducted it peacefully.

Another gentleman tells us that he objects to the use of an army because he is dissatisfied with the condition of affairs in Utah. Sir, I make no question with him upon that point. I have not read the voluminous papers which have been sent us on that subject; but I am prepared to say from the examination which I have been able to make, that, in my opinion, much of the difficulty in that Territory has arisen from the character and conduct of the officers who have been sent there; that, if other men, pursuing a different line of conduct, had been sent as Federal officers, the position of the Mormons toward the Government would have been different.

Then, following that, the same gentleman said:

Sir, if there is one sentiment more deeply engraven upon the hearts of the American people than any other, it is this: that they will obey law, and will require obedience in others. The public sentiment of this country will never justify the American Legislature in withholding from the Executive a sufficient power to enable him to assert its dignity, and to execute the law.

He proceeded:

We are told that a standing army is dangerous to the liberties of the people. I will not quarrel with that maxim. I know that its truth is sustained by history. I know that in ancient Rome the people and government were the sport of the cohorts of the pretorian camp; but before that time arrived the imperial purple had been stained with the blood of its victims, and liberty had disappeared forever from the seven-hilled city. I know that in modern times a usurper, in one night, by the power of his army, seated himself upon a throne which seems firm; but before that night the liberties of the people had been crushed out under forms of a free government, and the Presidency was as great a despotism as the empire now is. But, sir, was it ever heard that an army of twenty thousand men, scattered over three millions of square miles, coming from the people, returning to the people, supported by taxes raised from the people, and voted by their Representatives, was dangerous to the liberties of twenty-five million of freemen? It is the suggestion of a weak imagination, and not the sober apprehension of a manly judgment.

I have read this in answer to the declarations that have been so frequently made that the Army had never been used under democratic administrations, and I am sorry that the Senator who made this declaration in 1858 is not in his seat. He is one who stands high in the estimation of the democratic party, one who has been honored much; it is the Senator from Ohio, GEORGE H. PENDLETON.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. There are some other important amendments. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has an amendment and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] an amendment. Perhaps we can dispose of them now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for the present.

Mr. ANTHONY. I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BECK. About twenty minutes more I think will dispose of all the amendments. The Senator from Illinois has one, and I only know of one or two others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to strike out certain lines.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was understood that that should be laid aside informally and not acted upon until the other amendments were disposed of. When that comes up for action, I shall be glad to say a few words, not detaining the Senate long.

Mr. BECK. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois has not been considered carefully by the committee, but by such of us as could get together I am instructed to make the point of order against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. BECK. It sets aside existing law.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is to add at the end of the bill:

SEC. —. That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or disease incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices and positions in all the departments of the Government, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices and positions.

Mr. BECK. The change of law that I refer to is that it limits the power of the President and the appointing officers to a particular class of persons instead of allowing them to exercise their discretion among all persons who are eligible as the law now stands.

Mr. LOGAN. I will, without discussing the point of order, read a section of the statutes, to be found on page 169 of volume 19.

That whenever, in the judgment of the head of any Department, the duties assigned to a clerk of one class can be as well performed by a clerk of a lower class or by a female clerk, it shall be lawful for him to diminish the number of clerks of the higher grade and increase the number of the clerks of the lower grade within the limit of the total appropriation for such clerical service: Provided, That in making any reduction of force in any of the Executive Departments, the head of such Department shall retain those persons who may be equally qualified who have been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, and the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors.

My amendment is only continuing a law that exists on the statute-book and enlarging it; it is not changing the law but only enlarging its scope.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the amendment is out of order, the Chair believing that to enlarge its scope is to change the law.

Mr. BECK. The only other amendment I know of is one offered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BRUCE,] who is not in his seat. Perhaps it had better lie over until he comes in. The same point of order will be made against that.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi offered?

Mr. BECK. It was left with the committee, and we thought it best to call attention to it, making the same point of order against it, unless it is desirable to let it remain until the Senator from Mississippi comes in.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the amendment had better be passed over until he comes in.

Mr. BECK. Very well; let it go until the Senator from Mississippi comes in. It is a clear change of the law.

Mr. TELLER. A few days since the Senate refused to adopt the amendment of the committee by which they struck out a portion of the bill reported from the House, the House having made certain money in the Treasury available for the purpose of paying the arrears of pensions. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] offered an amendment which was ruled out of order, and I offered an amendment which also was ruled out of order on the ground that it changed existing law. If the object of the provision on page 70 of the bill as it came from the House for the releasing from the Treasury of eight and a half millions, concerning which considerable discussion took place the other day, is to enable the pensioners to be paid promptly, there is a necessity for some further words in the statute. If the only object was to enable the eight and a half million to be paid out and thus increase the money in circulation eight and a half million without any reference to the pensioners, then perhaps it is right as it stands. The Senator from Kansas then, having in view the efficiency of the bill with reference to the payment of the pensioners, offered an amendment which was declared out of order. I thought I had obviated the objection by the amendment I offered, but that was then also declared out of order.

Now, Mr. President, I have another amendment, and I submit it just simply for the purpose of seeing whether anybody who was friendly to the proposition for the paying out of this money is disposed now to object to its being paid out in the way in which the general discussion of those who voted for it would lead the pensioners to suppose they were in favor of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 70, line 1705, after the words "eighteen hundred and seventy-six," it is moved to insert:

Provided, That as the claims for arrears of pensions shall be settled and determined, and as often as once in thirty days, the Secretary of the Interior shall make requisition upon the Secretary of the Treasury for the funds necessary to pay all claims then settled.

Mr. TELLER. That simply renders it impossible by delay or by negligence to have the money lying in the Treasury after the claims are adjudicated. I do not ask that the Treasury officials shall make any undue haste, but I say simply that when the claims are adjudicated and settled, then they shall be paid. Now, if there is anybody on this floor who wants to vote against that, I wish to see who it is.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to make every question of order where any new legislation is proposed, and believing that the order requiring a requisition is new legislation, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In addition to what my colleague on the committee has said——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is not debatable. The Chair does not hesitate to sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Very well. But I only wanted to state another ground.

Mr. BECK. Now I know of no other amendment that will be offered in Committee of the Whole; and if the Senator from Vermont will not object I would propose that the bill be now reported to the Senate, reserving the political questions and such others as gentlemen may see fit to reserve, so as to get it out of committee. I suppose those matters can be acted on as well in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see any objection to that. It is just as well to take a vote once on the political legislation as twice. I make no objection to the bill being reported to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. A number of gentlemen think we ought to vote at four o'clock to-morrow, and one or two others yet desire to be heard in the morning. Therefore I simply ask that the bill be reported to the Senate. I have only one point to reserve; I shall ask a vote of the Senate on the amendment increasing the clerical force of the Post-Office Department, and the change of one or two totals so as to make them agree with the amendments already adopted. Those are the only points the committee care about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BECK. I desire now to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that if he wishes to submit a motion for an executive session——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The first question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Perhaps they might be disposed of, and then the amendment I offered in committee and which is still pending striking out a portion of the bill might be taken up.

Mr. BECK. With the one that I reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to take the vote on the amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole en masse?

Mr. BECK. Except those that are reserved, one as to the clerks in the Post-Office Department, with a change of totals depending upon the result, and the other upon the one suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had the impression that the amendment as to clerks in the Post-Office Department was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator thought it ought to be rejected. I think with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of the two amendments suggested by the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, let us have the reserved amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first reserved amendment will be reported.

Mr. BECK. We do not care about any further vote now. If the Senator from Rhode Island desires an executive session now, I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had better dispose of these amendments now, if we can.

Mr. BECK. There are one or two gentlemen who advocated them yesterday who are not here now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. An understanding has been had, I am informed, that this bill shall be disposed of, without further debate, at four o'clock to-morrow. I was not present when that understanding was made, and had I been present, I should not have agreed to it, because I do not think it is a good plan; but as that agreement has been made we had better go on and finish the bill to-night if we can or to-morrow when we can. I have an important amendment to strike out a part of this bill, that I wish to address myself to briefly when the question really arises on striking out, not talking for the purpose of political effect, but endeavoring to show why it ought to be stricken out upon sound principles. That being the case, I want to have the chance at some time to say my brief say upon that subject, and I want to give notice now that at some time, as I was not present (being out for a few moments) when the understanding was come to that I shall claim that right and shall exercise it unless the rules of the Senate are changed.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no difficulty about that. The only two amendments now reserved are the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, and this other one about the Post-office Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is not any amendment reserved that I proposed, for the reason that it was not acted on in the committee either way. It is simply a motion to strike out.

Mr. ALLISON. Then let it be understood that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is now the pending proposition, and he will be entitled to the floor to-morrow morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I understood some other gentlemen have given notice of an intention to deliver formal speeches, and I do not wish to cut them out. I cannot, and it would not be right that I should, if they have given that notice. I therefore should not wish to take the floor now to the exclusion of anybody who has expected to deliver a formal address to the Senate; but I intend to speak to the amendment I have offered to some purpose, if I can, and for a short time when I get a fair opportunity that will not crowd anybody else.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senate will go on with the bill this afternoon. It seems to me it must be done if we are to vote, as it was agreed unanimously we shall do, at four o'clock to-morrow. I know several Senators who have expressed a desire to speak on the bill, and they will be cut off unless we have some more speeches to-night as we go on. I hope, therefore, that we shall sit on with this bill for an hour or two more, so that Senators can be heard. There are some who desire to speak—I am not one of them—who will otherwise be cut off.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the first of the reserved amendments, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 76, line 1869, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole struck out "seven" and inserted "eight;" on page 77, line 1871, struck out "seven" and inserted "eight;" and in line 1872, struck out "thirteen" and inserted "fourteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For Second Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of inspection and equipment, $2,000; eight clerks of class 4, one of whom shall have $200 additional as superintendent of railway adjustment; twenty-eight clerks of class 3; fourteen clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; four clerks, at $1,000 each; two assistant messengers; in all, $101,540.

Mr. HOUSTON. What has become of the amendments that preceded that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of two which were reserved by the Senator from Kentucky, have all been concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. No one here heard what was being done. There were amendments adopted in committee that I wanted to vote against in the early part of the bill. I understood from the gentlemen in charge of the bill that they had not been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment just read by the Secretary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that if by accident any amendment has been agreed to by the vote in gross that he wishes a separate vote on, I have no doubt he can get unanimous consent to consider that amendment as still reserved. I am sure he can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama want unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the amendment referred to by him reserved?

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to vote against that amendment. I want to vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator indicate the amendment?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is the amendment in relation to the employés of the Senate and the additional permanent clerks made for committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent of the Senate to reserve the question upon the amendment indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. MAXEY. Is the vote now upon concurring in the amendment offered as in Committee of the Whole relative to the additional permanent clerks for committees?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question indicated by the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to have that amendment considered as reserved for a separate vote. The Chair hears no objection and the amendment will be considered as reserved for a separate vote. The question now is on concurring in the amendment read by the Secretary a few moments since.

Mr. MAXEY. What is the amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. Increasing the number of clerks in the Post-Office Department. It is not necessary to report it again.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I was unavoidably detained from the Senate on Saturday when a vote on the pending amendment was taken. I regret that the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote added to the bill three clerks in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Economy in governments, as well as in all business transactions, is requisite to success; and depend upon it, Senators, extravagance, come where it may, in family, in business, or in government, tells in the end against those who cause it.

Now, what are the facts here? Three additional clerks have been added by the Senate over and above the estimates of the Department. Four have been added to the bill, the committee having added one because it was estimated for and asked by the Department, but the other three clerks, so far as the Committee on Appropriations know, no Department has asked for, certainly they were not asked for or talked of by the representative of the Post-Office Department that was before the Committee on Appropriations.

About $3,000,000 in addition to the amount expended last year, over and above the revenue of the Department, is the increase in the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year. Senators, are you ready to continue voting a deficit or an additional amount of money in the Post-Office Department merely because it is asked? How is it that my republican friends are so much more willing to vote now than they were a year or two ago an increase of these clerks? In looking over the list, without calling any names, I find that, with the exception of the republican members of the committee, almost every man on the other side now votes for increase of this clerical force. Last year they voted for a decrease or to have the number remain where it was. How is it that there is so much more liberality on that side of the House now than a year ago? And I ask my friends on this side why is it that any of them want further extravagance in the Post-Office Department. I have just stated that $3,000,000 is the estimate of its cost this year over and above the income, more than it cost a year or two ago. If there is a Department of the Government, in my judgment, that ought to be curtailed, it is the Post-Office Department. I believe I am correct in saying that it is the only Department that has increased its expenditures within the last few years, and it has increased its expenditures over and above its revenue $3,000,000 in round numbers the present year beyond last year.

I think we ought to go slowly; we ought to think before we vote additional compensation or additional clerks to any of the Departments at present. The estimates, coming as they do from and through the Treasury Department, having been inspected by the President, as I presume, do not ask for this increase; and yet we here in the Senate have voted it. Who asks it? I understand the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has asked it. It is true we have had a recommendation in a very moderate way from the Postmaster-General, who indorses what is asked for—three additional clerks in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. We have already given in the same Department ten additional clerks in the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's office. That the committee believed was ample.

I hope Senators will take into consideration and think of this matter, and not go outside of and above the estimates, and as I believe, after inquiry and hearing all the Post-Office Department had to say, over and above what is actually necessary for the Department, especially as this is an extra expenditure over and above their estimates or over and above what it is for the present year, and for the present year it is nearly three million more than it was last year.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I do not desire, nor do I intend, to make any additional argument more than I made when I presented this amendment on behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The remarks made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations suggest that he believes this is extravagant, and that it is simply proposed on the application of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, backed by a very modest letter on the part of the Postmaster-General. The Postmaster-General states in that letter that this is needed, and he states that the reason why it is needed is on account of the increase in the business in that branch of his Department, owing to the nineteen hundred additional mail-routes established at the last session of Congress.

Now, I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] that they used my argument in a manner which was not at all justified and ought not to be made by them as lawyers. I did quote a maxim of the law which I believed to be applicable, omnia præsumuntur rité et solemniter esse acta, and from that I deduced that this, being an official act of the head of a Department, was presumed to be correct, and yet both of those gentlemen saw proper to assert in the presence of the Senate that I said because he recommended it therefore it should go down whether or no; that that was sufficient.

I never said anything of the kind, never argued it; but I did say that prima facie the statement of the Postmaster-General being official and made to Congress, for the time being stands good until suspicion is cast upon it, which has not been done; and those gentlemen who are lawyers, ought to draw that distinction upon an argument made by me from a maxin which they ought to know, and what I stated about it. I stated that it was presumed to be good until set aside, and I further stated that no suspicion had been cast on that statement, nor has there been any. I hope the Senate will concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think we had better have the yeas and nays. The question should be settled definitely.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What is the precise question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which was reported a few minutes since. Does the Senator desire that it shall be reported again?

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to hear it reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is, in line 1869, to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" in line 1871 to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "twenty-eight," and in line 1872 to strike out "thirteen" and insert "fourteen."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The amendment simply adds three clerks in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has already had one added by the bill. It is to add three over and above the estimates.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] I notice that most of his friends have voted in the negative, and I refrain from voting. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am paired for this afternoon on political questions with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] who is necessarily absent from the Chamber, but this I do not regard as a political question. I do not know how the Senator from Missouri would vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bell,	Coke,	Logan,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Ferry,	McDonald,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Garland,	McMillan,	Teller,
Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Maxey,	Voorhees.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Paddock,
Chandler,	Kirkwood,	Platt,

NAYS—26.

Bailey,	Edmunds,	Lamar,	Walker,
Beck,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Booth,	Harris,	Ransom,	Williams,
Butler,	Hereford,	Saulsbury,	Windom,
Call,	Houston,	Slater,	Withers.
Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Thurman,
Eaton,	Kernan,	Vance,

ABSENT—25.

Allison,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Randolph,
Anthony,	Farley,	Jonas,	Sharon,
Bayard,	Gordon,	Jones of Nevada,	Vest,
Carpenter,	Groome,	Kellogg,	Whyte.
Cockrell,	Grover,	McPherson,
Conkling,	Hamlin,	Pendleton,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reserved by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] Does the Senator from Alabama desire the vote taken in gross upon the amendments reserved by him, there being various items or heads, or does he wish a separate vote upon each of the amendments?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will take the question by one vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendments.

The SECRETARY. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, made the following amendments:

In line 19, after the word "thousand," strike out "five hundred" and insert "eight hundred and ninety-six;" in line 22, strike out "six" before "hundred" and insert "twelve;" in line 22, after "Chief Clerk," strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand;" in line 24, strike out "and" before "minute;" in the same line, after "journal clerk," insert "financial clerk, and enrolling clerk, at;" in line 25, after "hundred," insert "and ninety-two;" in line 26, after "each," strike out "financial clerk and three clerks, at $2,250 each;" in line 28, before "clerks," strike out "five" and insert "six;" in line 29, after "thousand," insert "two hundred and twenty;" in line 30, after "each," strike out "one clerk at $1,800" and insert "five clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at $2,100 each;" in line 33, after "stationery," strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,102.40;" in line 36, after "thousand," strike out "four" and insert "eight;" in line 37, after "hundred," insert "and ninety-six;" in line 38, after "Senate," strike out "six hundred" and insert "seven hundred and twenty;" and in line 40, after "hundred," insert "and ninety-six;" in line 42, strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,102.40;" in line 52, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,220."

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BECK. On page 2, line 16, I move to strike out, before "dollars," the words "eighty-seven thousand four hundred and twenty-two" and insert "eighty-nine thousand six hundred and forty-two."

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire if it is not the uniform custom of the Senate to allow those additions of the amounts appropriated to be made by the Clerk?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, not that exactly.

Mr. BECK. This is simply a change of the total so as to provide for the permanent clerk that the Senate voted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is only a change in a footing made necessary by the addition of a permanent clerkship, and nothing else.

Mr. BECK. It is only a change in footing made necessary as I have stated.

Mr. HOAR. The Clerk is always directed to make those corrections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. That is all I believe, now, except the political amendment so called.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at six o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 20, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 2d instant, a report of the Third Auditor of the Treasury relating to the account of Colonel Thomas Worthington for Army supplies in 1861; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 617) granting an increase of pension to William H. Hale; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 618) for the relief of Herman Holman and Crawford Fairbanks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 619) for the relief of certain actual settlers on the Kansas trust and diminished-reserve lands in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 620) granting a pension to Jacob Nix; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

USE OF TROOPS.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask leave to introduce a bill authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes. I ask that it be read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the first time by its title and the second time at length.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has there been notice given of an intention to ask leave to introduce the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The Chair is not aware that there has been notice given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the reading of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to its being read for information of what the Senator from Indiana gives notice that he will introduce.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce the bill without previous notice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will hear it read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported.

The Secretary read the proposed bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the United States shall be invaded or be in imminent danger of invasion, or whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed or the execution thereof obstructed in any State by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the power invested in the marshals by this act, and official information shall be furnished thereof by a judge of the Supreme Court, or judge of any circuit or district court of the United States sitting or exercising judicial authority within the limits of any such State; or in case of any insurrection or domestic violence in any State against the government thereof, and the Legislature of such State or the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) has made application therefor, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State, or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may deem necessary to repel such invasion, or to suppress such combination and to cause the laws to be duly executed, or to suppress such insurrection, or put down domestic violence in such State; and the use of the militia so called forth may be continued if necessary until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the next session of Congress.

SEC. 2. In all cases of invasion, insurrection or domestic violence, or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of repelling such invasion, or suppressing such insurrection or domestic violence, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ for the same purpose such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he shall judge necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect, but it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus or otherwise for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress.

SEC. 3. The marshals of the United States in their respective districts shall have power to execute all lawful process and precepts to them directed and issued under the authority of the United States, and in the execution thereof shall have the power to command all necessary assistance.

SEC. 4. All laws and parts of laws heretofore enacted which are in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. All laws and parts of laws heretofore passed by the Congress of the United States regulating the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress are hereby repealed.

Mr. McDONALD. If the Senator from Vermont will permit the bill to be received, it is my purpose to ask that it lie on the table, and to-morrow or next day I shall call it up for a second reading with a view of having it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall want to reflect before I can vote to have the bill brought in; and therefore my friend will have to give notice of his intention to bring it in at some future day.

Mr. McDONALD. That is very unusual, Mr. President. Of course, it is the right of the Senator to make that objection. It will simply delay the introduction of the bill one day. If he thinks a delay of one day will give him time to inquire whether a bill of this kind should go to the Judiciary Committee, of course it is his right to do so.

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be printed.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire that it shall be printed, and on to-morrow or next day—I am not particular as to the time—I propose to submit some remarks upon the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I only disagree with my honorable friend, the Senator from Indiana, as to this course of mine being very unusual. In those glorious better days that my honorable friend thinks he is so hungry for, that existed in the time of the better men of the Republic, it was always the custom on important measures to ask leave or to give notice of the intention to bring in a bill, and the principal discussion on the general merits of the bill was always had on a motion for leave to bring it in. Therefore, wishing to be like my honorable friend in some respects, as to admiration for those who have gone before us, I think I am not trespassing either upon the rules or the courtesy of the Senate, when I wish that course to be taken in respect of this bill.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator is undoubtedly exercising the right he has. I ask that the bill be printed, and I now give notice that to-morrow morning I shall introduce it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, the Senator will ask leave to introduce it.

Mr. McDONALD. I will ask leave to introduce it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana gives notice that he will ask leave to introduce the bill that has been read.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (to Mr. McDONALD.) Ask leave now to introduce it.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask leave now to introduce the bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I object to. That is not within the rules. The Senator can give notice that he will ask for leave to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is the rule.

Mr. McDONALD. I will put it in any form that will suit the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The twenty-second rule provides that—

One day's notice at least shall be given of an intended motion for leave to bring in a bill or joint resolution, but in the introduction of bills or joint resolutions on leave such notice may be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

The notice that the Senator gives must be a notice that he will ask for leave to bring in the bill.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask that the bill be returned to me, and under the rule just read I now give notice that to-morrow morning I shall ask leave to bring in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice will be noted on the Journal.

EVANS'S COMPILATION OF IMPORTS.

Mr. BECK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into and report as to the propriety of procuring for the use of Congress a compilation of the imports into the United States and the rate of duties thereon, which has been prepared by Charles H. Evans, in the Bureau of Statistics.

WILBUR F. M'DANIEL.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I desire to offer a resolution. Before doing so, however, I wish to say to the Senate that the young man whose name is mentioned in the resolution is a young man who acted as page of the Senate for several years, and in the discharge of his duties as page some time ago, in coming down the marble steps on the east side of the building, fell over the banisters and struck his head, seriously injuring himself and almost incapacitating him for any other work than that of a page or messenger. He has reached the period of life when he can no longer act upon the floor as a page, and I hope the Senate will authorize his employment in the capacity designated in the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Wilbur F. McDaniel be, and he is hereby, appointed messenger to the superintendent of the document-room, at a salary not exceeding $720 a year.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maryland whether the resolution provides an additional officer of the body.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know whether or not hereafter the young man may be worked in as one of the present officers, but temporarily it is an additional office. There is no place for him at the present time without turning somebody else out; and he is a young man whose condition appeals to the sympathies of the Senate. Cutler, who was injured by the explosion of gas down-stairs, is permanently employed, and this young man is the only person I have known to be injured in the service of the Senate who is not employed at this time.

The resolution was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to give notice that immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, I shall ask the body to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 108, known as the quarantine or epidemic diseases bill.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, what is the pleasure of the Senate? [A pause.] Nothing being moved the Chair will declare the morning hour at an end, and the unfinished business is the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, if it is agreeable to the Senate, I should like to occupy a few moments of its time on the pending bill unless the Senator who has it in charge has something special to present at present.

Mr. BECK. I supposed the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not stated the question. The pending question is the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont, to strike out a portion of the bill, to wit, beginning with line 2108 to line 2168, inclusive.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I should not presume to occupy the time of the Senate with any remarks upon the subject now under consideration if it were not for the persistent manner in which the friends of this bill and those lately vetoed by the President urge this unnecessary if not unusual legislation. Three appropriation bills have now been before this extra session, each loaded down with proposed legislation entirely irrelevant to an appropriation bill.

It is disclaimed on the part of the majority that there is any intention to carry this legislation so far as to be chargeable with revolutionary designs, and so far we have given them credit for candor; but how far, I ask, can this course be pursued without subjecting it to such a charge? The fact that bills pass both Houses and are not approved by the President is not an unusual one, and should not of itself suffice to fasten a stigma upon the friends of such bills, nor subject the Executive to the unmeasured abuse which has been heaped upon him for exercising his constitutional power. The Constitution provided for such emergencies, and they arise and are disposed of as matters of course; but if Congress should refuse to provide the means with which to carry on the Government, refuse to furnish the "sinews of war," because the President will not allow safeguards adopted almost in the very hour of our birth as a nation and thrown around the rights of electors to be repealed and stricken from our statutes, then if this is not revolution, or an attempt to destroy the Government, what else can it be called?

Why, Mr. President, is all this clamor for a repeal of these laws at this time? Has any body or set of men, anywhere, asked for it? Has the Senate had a single petition asking that this thing be done? Has any damage been inflicted upon any one, anywhere, to call for such legislation? Has the President at any time used the Army, or have United States marshals by his order used their authority, in any way that should call forth such persistent efforts to make these changes at this time? I answer, nothing of the kind. What, then, does all this mean to which we have listened so patiently and so long, and which is, in fact, exciting the suspicion and disgust of the intelligent masses of the North? Do gentlemen on the other side know that they are suspected of wishing to remove the possibility of having a Federal officer at the polls, in order that a free use might be made of the shot-gun and revolver to deter one class of citizens, and those in many instances in the majority, from exercising their rights at the polls? These unfortunates, though outnumbering their opponents in some of the Southern States, are poor, timid, and unarmed. Free they are, so far as being able to call body and soul their own, but I aver they are not free to enjoy their political rights under the Constitution and the laws. The right which, under a republican form of government, does most to make a man feel that he is a man is partly taken from them now, and I fear will be denied them absolutely if the policy under consideration prevails.

A few years ago in the other end of the Capitol might be seen on the left of the Speaker's stand quite a respectable number of the dusky sons of the South who were there to represent, among others, their own race. But where are they now? Gone! Why? Is it because the colored majorities in the States referred to do not want their wishes represented in the Congress of the United States? Certainly not. The reason of their absence is too well known to us and to the country to need a statement from me. Elections as they are now conducted in the South may be fair and free, but it will be hard to make the people of the North believe it while the South is solid in the support of the democratic party, when it is well known that in several of the States the colored voters are in the majority and strongly in favor of the republican party as the one that struck off their shackles and let them go free.

Now, how are these majorities treated? How stands the representation in this Congress? Are numbers properly respected? Let us see. The colored people constitute about one-tenth of the population of this Union. If, then, they had their just representation in the House of Representatives they would have between twenty-five and thirty members, but to-day they have not one to tell the story of their wrongs, or to defend or advocate their rights. In this Chamber they would be entitled, according to numbers, to seven or eight Senators, but only one is permitted here, and notwithstanding his abilities and the satisfactory manner in which he discharges his duties and his attention to the wants of his constituents, he could not, I presume, be re-elected by any Legislature which could possibly be chosen in his State. What does this mean, but that the democratic party, under pretense of maintaining freedom of elections, proposes to virtually disfranchise one-tenth of the voting population of the country? So well is the sinister character of this policy understood by those persons most deeply interested, that they are flying panic-stricken at the momentary return to political power of their former task-masters and oppressors.

In a republican form of government the safety and perpetuity of the entire fabric are dependent upon the privilege, the right of having and enjoying an honest and free ballot. I ask if this can be secured to the people unless the Executive shall have the power left with him to see that all laws protecting this right are enforced? To do this effectually both the civil and military power of the Government should remain in his hands; not to be abused, but to be used if necessary to support and sustain the freedom of the ballot. This view of the subject is clearly expressed by the President in the able message he last addressed to Congress. I quote his language:

> Holding, as I do, the opinion that any military interference whatever at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and would tend to destroy the freedom of elections, and sincerely desiring to concur with Congress in all of its measures, it is with very great regret that I am forced to the conclusion that the bill before me is not only unnecessary to prevent such interference, but is a dangerous departure from long-settled and important constitutional principles.
> The true rule as to the employment of military force at the elections is not doubtful. No intimidation or coercion should be allowed to control or influence citizens in the exercise of their right to vote, whether it appears in the shape of combinations of evil-disposed persons or of armed bodies of the militia of the State, or the military force of the United States.
> The elections should be free from all forcible interference, and, as far as practicable, from all apprehensions of such interference. No soldier, either of the Union or of the State militia, should be present at the polls to take the place or to perform the duties of the ordinary civil police force.

To this doctrine, sir, I freely and heartily subscribe, but at the same time I must insist on retaining in the hands of the Government all the power, both military and civil, necessary to uphold and perpetuate itself. By the Constitution the President is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and not of these only, but of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. I am in favor of the President retaining this power and maintaining the dignity of his office, not parting with any part of it under any plea whatever, that the securities we boast might remain to us, and that we might rest ourselves with the assurance that vigilance, not only sleepless but armed, watches over our liberties. The proposition made by the other side of the House is that for three hundred and sixty-four days out of the year the Executive should have and enjoy the control of the Army and Navy, but that for the other day of the three hundred and sixty-five he should abandon his rights, sleep upon his post, spurn the insignia of his high office, in fact abdicate and for that day abandon liberty to suffer violation at the pleasure of every political rough or scamp.

I believe in a government with power to sustain itself! I believe the Constitution gives this Government that power! I believe the people of this country intend that this Government, the creation of their own wisdom, enriched by their own sacrifices and cemented by their own blood, should have in itself power, not only to compel the respect of foreign enemies, but of domestic traitors. In other words, I believe in leaving with the Government to-day and for the future as much power as it had when it crushed rebellion and received its final surrender at Appomattox. I believe it to be the hope and desire of every true American citizen that armed troops or any other body of armed men may never be seen at the polls; but at the same time I do not believe that any true and loyal citizen of the country desires to see the power lessened whereby the Government is enabled to uphold and sustain itself.

For my part, I hope never to see any occasion for calling upon the military arm to protect the ballot-box. Nevertheless, if its rights were invaded to such an extent as to require it, then I would say bring every power to bear to sustain these rights, for upon them our national existence depends. The laws now in force and which are sought to be repealed seem to me essential to the enjoyment of our privileges as citizens of the Republic. They are harmless to the law-abiding, and go no further than any law demands for its own existence. Behind every enjoyment of right and every prohibition of wrong there must stand the force without which either would be unavailing. In this connection I desire to quote from a speech recently delivered on this subject, so nobly conceived and so nobly expressed that I use his language in preference to my own. He says:

> I have neither the time nor the disposition to enter into a general discussion of those laws sought to be repealed. Their nature and purpose are well known to the House and to the country; but I cannot refrain from observing that if gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are really anxious to preserve the peace and purity of the ballot-box, why attempt to tear down the only remaining national fortress reared for the defense of either? Do you desire, gentlemen, an honest registration? These laws provide for it. Do you want a pure ballot? They promote it. Do you want a fair count? They insure it. Do you desire a true return? They enjoin it. Do you want order and peace at the polls? They command it. Do you want repeaters and ballot-box stuffers, thugs and red-shirts punished? They secure it. And there is nothing in these laws that is a terror to any man except him who has already committed or is now meditating some outrage upon the ballot-box of his country.

In the foregoing, Mr. President, is expressed in a few words much that is calculated to attract the attention of the people of our country. "Let well enough alone" is a common but very expressive saying, and one that this Congress might with great propriety and good effect adopt at this time. Let us wait till we are asked by somebody to change the laws which have had such peaceful and, as I believe, beneficial effects, before we strike them from our statutes.

But, Mr. President, this subject has been so ably and so fully discussed by Senators who have had longer experience in this body than I have, that I deem it unnecessary for me to do more than to enter my protest against the repeal of that part of our election laws which throws around the honest voter about the only safeguards he has, and which secures to him the right due to every man to cast one free and fair vote at each election.

No, sir, I have no hope of changing any Senator's vote on this question, for I have no doubt but the number of those who will support or oppose this bill is perhaps as fully defined now as ever the old-school doctrine of election and reprobation defined the numbers of those to be saved or lost. In this case, however, we must leave it to the voters, who are the party most deeply interested in the subject, to decide who shall be the saved and who the lost, and to that tribunal I am perfectly willing to appeal or refer this case.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, it is never agreeable to trespass upon the patience of a deliberative body at the close of a long and exhaustive debate; and I could hardly find excuse now for vexing the ear of the Senate by further discussion, were it not for the extraordinary character of the speeches made upon the other side of the Chamber, calculated, if not intended, to place the conduct of those upon this side of it before the country in an unenviable light unless the antidote shall go out with the poison. I am tempted, therefore, to make brief reply to some of the statements and arguments presented by Senators who belong to the republican party.

Last February I expressed my opinion in the Senate in regard to the constitutionality of the election laws which the disputed sections of this bill are intended to repeal; and my objection now to the political legislation herein contained is that it is not expansive enough for me. In my opinion, the supervisors as well as the deputy marshals ought to go. I am opposed, on principle, to all kinds of Federal interference, civil or military, with the exercise of suffrage at any election, State or congressional. I find no warrant for it in the recent amendments to the Constitution, or in section 4 of article 1 of the original instrument.

I tried to show in my remarks in February, from contemporaneous exposition of that instrument, that section 4 in article 1 was inserted merely as a reserve power, to be used in the case of neglect or refusal upon the part of the States to make regulations for such elections, and to preserve the life of the "United States." I supported my views by the report of the Committee of Elections, of which Judge Douglas was chairman, in the House of Representatives in the Twenty-eighth Congress, in reference to the act of 1842, June 25, which required members of the House to be elected by districts, and not by general ticket—by the action of the House in repudiating such congressional interference and seating the members elected in defiance of that act.

I endeavored to show that, even admitting the power contained in section 4 of article 1, as construed, it had been exhausted in providing for the times, by fixing the day of election, the places, in setting the districts, and the manner, by determining the vote to be by ballot, and not viva voce. I then objected to further interference on the part of Congress in the elections, even for members of the House, and maintained there was no power under the Constitution whereby Congress could compel the judiciary to appoint officers, like supervisors, for political duties. These were my views then, and they have been confirmed by the discussions which have been had upon the bills before the present Congress. There are no such elections, in my judgment, as national elections. All elections are State or municipal elections.

There are no elections of United States officers and no voters of the United States. The voters are voters of the States, they are the people of the States, and their members of the House of Representatives are chosen by the electors of the States to represent the people of the States, whose agents they are. The Senator from Georgia truly said: "Our fathers found no model of our form of government in ancient or modern history." It had no prototype in form, it had no parallel in its perfection of wisdom. It differed from all other republics in that representative system which it established, and this was in conformity with the great law in which the Revolution had its origin, that representation and taxation should go hand in hand together. A written constitution and representation of the State governments in the Senate and of the people of the several States in the House of Representatives, this was the cardinal distinction which contrasted ours with all other republican forms of government. It was this sublime evidence of political sagacity and discrimination in our fathers which has excited the wonder of the civilized world. Writers on federal governments have pointed to this new feature in a republican system as a grand step in political science.

Referring to his text, speaking of the Achaian confederation and subsequently as to the Lykian confederation, Mr. Freeman, in his Historical Essays, says in a note:

I am not sure that when I wrote this, or even when I wrote what I said upon the same matter in the History of Federal Government, 1, 273 and 274, I fully understood that in a perfect federal constitution it was needful to have two houses, one of which represents the sovereignty of the united nation, and in which the vote to be taken is that of the majority of the whole people or their representatives, while the other house represents the separate sovereignty of the several cantons, and must give an equal voice to each canton, great or small. This object is gained in the United States by the Senate and House of Representatives as distinct and equal branches of the Federal Legislature. In Switzerland it is gained not only by the same constitution of the federal legislature the Staerderath and Nationalrath answering to the Senate and House of Representatives, but also by the distinct votes of the cantons and of the people, which are taken in the case of a constitutional amendment. No arrangement of votes in a single assembly, whether primary or representative, can in the same way give them due weight to each of the two elements of that divided sovereignty which is the essence of a federal state. But there is no need to blame either the Achaian or the Lykian confederation for not at once reaching to the latest refinements of modern political science. We must always remember that in all these commonwealths representation was unknown, though especially in the case of the Lykian league, they often trembled on the very verge of it. And in Greece, at least, the co-ordinate power of two legislative chambers was altogether unknown, though something like it may be seen in the relations between the senate and the popular assembly in the best days of Rome.

Representation thus was the distinguishing feature of our Republic. Now, who are represented in the House of Representatives? Is it the people of the United States? Not at all. Article 1, section 2, of the Constitution shows us that it is the people of the several States. As these are to be represented, they are the competent authorities to select; and are they not able and competent to protect the selection?

The Senator from Vermont may say, but where do the people of the States get the power to elect Representatives? and he will answer, from the Constitution; but I say, where did you get the Constitution? and the answer comes, from the people of the several States. The people first, the Constitution afterward. The people are the constituents; they reserved the right to choose their agents in the Federal Legislature. In that "bond of union" they provided for their own representation to carry out those clearly defined powers which they had delegated to the Government of the United States, and they reserved to themselves or to the States all powers not delegated to the Government so created. And these rights, so reserved, are those State rights so roundly denounced in this Chamber, and so unjustly held up to reprobation, as if those who maintain them were supporting doctrines hostile to the peace of the Union, and rights which were destroyed by the victory of the Union arms in the civil war. How can Senators sworn to support the Constitution, with article 10 of the amendments before their eyes, denounce their brethren for standing loyal to the doctrine of the reserved rights of the States?

Never faithless in my devotion to the Union of the States, I am not willing to rest silently under a denunciation which accuses us on this side of the Chamber with maintaining some "damnable heresy" of which we ought to be ashamed.

Now, what is the issue which has sprung up in the discussion of the political clauses in this appropriation bill? A gentleman high in the republican party, speaking in another place, which I am not at liberty to name, thus states the doctrine on which his party stands. Let it go to the country, and let those who have studied our form of government understand the theories of the republican party, or let those republicans who do not believe it deny that these sentiments truly represent the doctrines of that party:

We are a nation. That is the first doctrine of the republican party; to establish it we fought the war.

Why, I thought we were a nation in the family of nations long before the war was ever dreamed of.

There can be no nation without law and the administration of law. The enactment and administration of law constitute government. Laws must be made, construed, and enforced. This is so because God has thus ordained it. It is the nature of things.

* * * * * * *

Now, our nation is a nation, and the form of our Government is republican not primarily because of anything contained in the written Constitution.

We are a nation, therefore, without a constitution; the Constitution is all a myth; we are a nation of ourselves; we are a nation created, ordained of God! Is that the doctrine of the republican party?

We are a nation because we are human beings inhabiting a given territory, united by relations and laws and interests created by God and inflexible as nature and fate. Our form of government is republican—

Why? Not because our fathers entered into a form of government republican in its character; not because under the Constitution we have ordained that every State shall have guaranteed to it a republican form of government, but our form of government is republican—because no other is possible over just such a people as we now are, for we will consent to no other; and the written Constitution is a consequence, and in no sense a cause.

"The nation would exist without it!" Can that be the doctrine of the republican party in regard to this great galaxy of States, drawn together in a bond of union, cemented by the strongest ties that can bind man and man together, living under a written constitution, governed by laws ordained by virtue of that constitution and passed by Congress under it, and under it only? Does the republican party maintain such a doctrine as this?

The nation would exist without it; the Government would be republican without it. The written Constitution performs an invaluable function as a compendious statement of principles and laws; but the principles would exist, and the Constitution as such be applied by the people, if there were no written law.

Well, if that is the doctrine of the republicans, enunciated by a leading republican as the doctrine of his party, it certainly is a doctrine that I have never known maintained in this country before to-day.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) Will the Senator from Maryland permit himself to be interrupted?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly, for an inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator whether the representatives of the State of Maryland, Samuel Chase, William Paca, Thomas Stone, and Charles Carroll, did not in behalf of that State declare in 1776 that the people of the American colonies were one people?

Mr. WHYTE. Probably they did. So they are one people, and I will show the Senator from Massachusetts that before they so declared the united colonies by resolution declared that they were free, sovereign, and independent States. We are one people. Let any foreign nation cross swords with us and it will find that we are one people.

Mr. HOAR. If it would not disturb the honorable Senator from Maryland, his reply does not touch the inquiry which I made. I understood him to arraign the republican party because some person in its name had declared that prior to the American Constitution we were a nation, and he wanted to know whether that utterance had ever been made before. I called his attention to the fact that the representatives of his own State and of all the others declared eleven years before the Constitution was framed that we were one people, to which he replies to me, "Oh, yes, certainly we are one people now." Was it not declared in substance by all the colonies that they were a nation eleven years before the Constitution was framed?

Mr. WHYTE. No, Mr. President, it never was declared that we were a nation.

Mr. HOAR. Then the Senator says we were one people but not a nation.

Mr. WHYTE. So we were one people, one people in sentiment, one people by the bond which bound us in resisting the tyranny across the ocean, one people by ties which made us stronger than "an army with banners" that had ever been mustered in any field before; one people that made us by a common sympathy answer in Maryland to the wrongs committed upon the people of Massachusetts. We were one people in sentiment then; we are one people in sentiment now; but not in the governmental understanding of the words "one people." We never were one people in that view of the case anterior to the adoption of the Constitution, and then only in a limited sense, as I propose to show.

Now, Mr. President, the remarks to which I referred do not speak of us as being a nation before the adoption of the Constitution. They speak of us as a nation now, and a nation without a constitution, a nation not bound by a constitution. The Constitution is treated as a mere programme or a compendious statement of principles by which we are governed, and that we would be governed without a constitution at all. This is the modern theory of some New England orators on the subject of our form of government. Now let us see what a Senator from the Northwest, from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] says of our Government:

THE NEW REBELLION AGAINST NATIONALITY.

That purpose was—

Speaking of the action of the House and of the democrats in the Senate in regard to the appropriation bills—

That purpose was, and is, to denationalize this nation, to convert it into a mere confederacy of States, and, under the new name of "Home Rule," to crown the old secession doctrine of "State sovereignty" with supreme power over the destinies of the Republic.

State sovereignty and secession! They have as little to do with each other, and are as far apart as the north and south poles. He continues:

In other words, it is an attempt to do by legislation what four years of bloody rebellion failed to do by the sword, namely: to destroy our nationality. Or, to state it still more concisely, it is an effort to recover the "lost cause."

And those of us on this floor who never raised a hand against the Union, who never participated in any way in the late war against the United States, are denounced as if we were striving to revive a "lost cause" in which we had no part nor lot. Again:

Upon all other questions the democratic church tolerates the widest latitude of opinion. The incendiary communist and the aristocratic conservative, the wildest inflationist and the very prince of bloated bondholders, all find a home in her ample folds; but on this essential tenet of party faith, he "who doubts is damned." North and South, East and West, in peace and in war, in victory and in defeat, the faithful democratic believer worships at the shrine of "State sovereignty."

I thank God he does; at that shrine I was taught to worship; and it will not do for any of these latter-day patriots to teach me that my adoration of that doctrine has been faithless in its character toward the form of government under which I live.

Facts and arguments are powerless to convince him of his error. Treason and rebellion against his country have failed to shake his adhesion to this supreme article of his creed. The only exception he ever tolerates is when the National Government "enters a State," as he calls it, with an appropriation, but without the old flag.

That is the mode in which our arguments are met; that is the way our arguments, based on reason, though it may be feebly expressed, are treated by our colleagues across the Chamber. We are to be held up before the country as rebels, as traitors, as faithless, as false to our Constitution and our country, because we do not subscribe to their doctrine of our form of government and their view of its administration.

Ah! Mr. President, that may do here. It will not do before the intelligent people of the United States. They will need arguments rather than denunciation; they will need the scintillations of intellect to carry them captive to the doctrines of the republican party rather than the bitter philippics hurled against men as true and faithful to the Constitution as any on that side of the Chamber can boast that they have been.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he does not agree with the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] on the subject of State rights.

Mr. WHYTE. After I have said what I have to say, the Senator from Minnesota will understand my views upon that subject. I pin my faith to no man's sleeve.

Mr. WINDOM. I will listen with great pleasure.

Mr. WHYTE. "A confederacy of States," "secession," and "State sovereignty" are so intimately blended in the speech of the Senator from Minnesota as to defy even a Philadelphia lawyer in his effort to understand what idea the Senator has of his own form of government. The presumption will hardly be violent if we say he thinks this is a nation composed of the people of the United States as an entirety; that the States are mere corporations, and but tributary to the National Government, and have no rights except those which the nation permits them to enjoy. I hold our splendid scheme of government in higher esteem than that. I affirm that it was created and endowed with all its powers in this form and none other, namely: That the people of the several States, acting in their highest sovereign capacity as free and independent States, adopted the Federal Constitution and established a form of government in the nature of a confederated republic; and, for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects for which it was formed, delegated to that Government certain rights, enumerated in said Constitution, but reserved to the States respectively, or to the people thereof, all the residuary powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States.

That is my doctrine of our form of government, prepared by my own hand with care to express my ideas, so that no man should put into my mouth any other view of our form of government than the one I entertain.

On this doctrine I stand to-day as I have stood all my life since I have been able to appreciate anything of a form of government at all, and I am not ashamed to uphold it as the true theory of our Government to be honored and respected by us, and to be transmitted as a precious legacy to our children's children. Now, to be brief, for I do not wish to occupy too much of the time of the Senate, a brief review of the history of the events preceding the formation of the Constitution and of its contemporaneous and later construction by the philosophical minds of the past will not leave much doubt of the real design of our fathers in framing that instrument.

To the first continental congress, which met in Philadelphia on the 5th of September, 1774, all the colonies except Georgia sent delegates.

The second continental congress, which assembled in Philadelphia on the 10th of May, 1775, and which chose George Washington to be Commander-in-Chief of the continental army, was composed of delegates from all the States. In that congress—and this is the point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts—in that congress, upon the motion of the delegates from Virginia, on the 2d of July, 1776, all the colonies resolved that the "united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." As States, not as one people. They were there representing the States, not representing a united people at all. Then and there they laid the foundation of that sovereign right which we now claim reserved in the State as an integral part and constituent of this our great country. Actuated by the same spirit for united action, eleven of the States adopted the articles of confederation in 1778, another did so in 1779, and the last of the thirteen in 1781, by which the States were joined in a bond of union.

The inefficiency of the government set up by these articles of confederation caused the people of the several States to enter into a new agreement for the purpose of forming a "more perfect Union;" and this agreement, ratified by conventions of the people in the respective States, became the Constitution, or organic law of the United States. When the Constitution had been framed and was sent to the Congress it was accompanied with resolutions by the convention and with a letter signed by George Washington to the president of Congress. Those resolutions suggested that the Constitution should be submitted to conventions in the several States chosen "by the people thereof, under the recommendation of the Legislature, for their assent and ratification." The assent and ratification, not of the Legislature, but of the people; and why? For the reason that the Constitution impinged upon the powers already given by the people to the Legislatures of their States.

That is why it was sent to be ratified by them, the people, the sovereign people in the several States, who had already given certain powers to their Legislatures. The governments of the States had been imbued with certain sovereign powers by the people; and as this Constitution of the United States impinged upon those powers antecedently granted to the Legislatures of the States it was necessary that the same people should be appealed to that they might withdraw those legislative powers already granted to their State Legislatures and confer them upon the General Government, as created by the Constitution of the United States.

In the formation and adoption of the Constitution the States were the factors. The delegates to the convention were chosen by the State Legislatures. They voted by States, a majority of the delegates from each State determining the votes of the State, but the conventions to which was submitted the Constitution for ratification or rejection were chosen by the "people of their respective States." The parties to the Constitution were thus the people of each of the several States, now mark you, that is, the political society known as the State, which became under that instrument "United States." And right here let me call the attention of the Senate to this distinction which is so confusing to men's minds who do not take the trouble to study our Constitution in its origin, in its inception, and the various phases through which it passed before it became a complete instrument.

In the language of Mr. Madison, in that famous letter written to Edward Everett and published in 1830 in the North American Review, "We must keep in view the distinction between the governments of the States and the States, in the sense in which they were parties to the Constitution."

The governments of the States is what we represent in the Senate; that is, what we call the State of Maryland that my colleague and I represent is the government of the State of Maryland; but the people of Maryland in convention ratified this Constitution as a political society. That society was made up of the people and was known as the State, and our fathers so understood it, and our fathers made the distinction and appreciated it. The State, as known in its government and the State as a political society are perfectly distinct and separate.

It was the majority of the people in each of the States which ratified the Constitution, not a majority of the people of the whole United States acting collectively. Article 7 says:

The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.

"Between the States;" not a confederacy of States, but between political societies known as the people of the States, and more clearly understood by the framers of the Constitution as the State itself, contradistinguished from the government of the State.

Now in that famous letter of Mr. Madison which at that time was hailed with loud acclaim by the Jackson democrats and by the whigs of that day, he lays down too clearly for any man to doubt the form of government as he understood it, and it will bear reading here in the Senate again. It would be well if it were read in every schoolhouse in the land; it would be well for the children now being educated throughout this broad land that they should learn something of the true principles of their own Government. They should be reared in the teachings of the fathers, that when they come to man's estate they can enjoy properly, as they should, this magnificent fabric of government which has descended to us from the revolutionary patriots. Let me read Mr. Madison's words:

In order to understand the true character of the Constitution of the United States, the error, not uncommon, must be avoided, of viewing it through the medium, either of a consolidated government or of a confederated government, while it is neither the one nor the other, but a mixture of both.

It was formed, not by the governments of the component States, as the Federal Government for which it was substituted, was formed. Nor was it formed by a majority of the people of the United States, as a single community in the manner of a consolidated government. * * * It was formed by the States, that is, by the people in each of the States, acting in their highest sovereign capacity, and formed consequently by the same authority which formed the State constitutions. * * * And that it divides the supreme powers of Government between the Government of the United States and the government of the individual States, is stamped on the face of the instrument.

He was but enunciating his earlier declarations, for when the Constitution was before the people for ratification, Mr. Madison maintained that this assent and ratification was to be given "by the people, not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong."

It is to be the assent and ratification of the several States, derived from the supreme authority in each State—the authority of the people themselves.

The act, therefore, establishing the Constitution will not be a national but a federal act; and thus he defines the true relations between the Federal and State governments.

In the forty-fifth number of The Federalist, he says:

The powers delegated to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain to the State government are numerous and indefinite.

In the letter of Roger Sherman and Oliver Ellsworth, 26th September, 1787, reporting to the governor of Connecticut the action of the convention, they say:

Some additional powers are vested in Congress, which was a principal object that the States had in view in appointing the convention. These powers extend only to matters respecting the common interests of the Union, and are specially defined, so that the particular States retain their sovereignty in all other matters.—Elliott's Debates, vol. 1, page 491.

So it was regarded in the conventions of ratification. In the convention of Virginia which ratified the Constitution of the United States Patrick Henry objected to the words "we, the people of the United States," lest it might be supposed that it meant the inhabitants of all the States as one homogeneous mass or aggregate. But Mr. Madison replied, "The parties to it are to be the people, but not the people as composing one great society, but the people as composing thirteen sovereignties."

The same spirit pervaded that good old State which my friend the honorable Senator in my eye [Mr. HOAR] now represents so honorably upon this floor. The constitution of Massachusetts as early as 1780 laid down a doctrine which I am sorry to see some of her sons would now seem to repudiate, a doctrine which all on this side of the Chamber I am sure will bow before with reverence and respect. That constitution declares:

The people of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves, as a free, sovereign and independent State, and do and forever hereafter shall exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction and right which is not or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States.

And this declaration has stood unchallenged for a century. Massachusetts has a right to govern itself; Massachusetts is free, sovereign, and independent; it has all the reserved rights of a State, and the United States has no more rights than those expressly delegated to it by Massachusetts; no man must lay his hand upon the old Bay State—Noli me tangere; every other State may be trodden under foot in their reserved rights, but "I am holier than thou," and Massachusetts must remain a free, sovereign, and independent State, and if any other State talks about sovereign rights and maintains that it is a sovereign State, its advocates and its representatives, on this floor and elsewhere, are to be denounced as raising the flag of secession and of disunion against the Government of this glorious country!

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maryland state by what authority he says that that doctrine is repudiated by the sons of Massachusetts this day, or by any of them?

Mr. WHYTE. By the way they argue, or else a man must be very dull who does not so understand it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator be kind enough to point out those against whom he makes the charge, or the utterance of any representative of Massachusetts on this floor whom he has in mind?

Mr. WHYTE. Has not the Senator risen to rebuke me and call me to order for speaking of the sovereignty of the State?

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. WHYTE. And maintained that it was one people and cited from a declaration of Charles Carroll and others that Maryland had declared that this was one people?

Mr. HOAR. Is that inconsistent with the doctrine which the Senator just read from the constitution of Massachusetts, in his judgment?

Mr. WHYTE. Why, perfectly inconsistent. If there are no sovereign rights of States and we are one nation and all our rights are merged into that one nation, what is the use of talking about States when they are called by the Senator from Minnesota mere corporations, or as Mr. Lincoln said, "as counties were to the State so the States were to the General Government?"

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maryland the question which I asked him just now, if he understands that the passage from the Declaration of Independence signed by Charles Carroll and others of which I reminded him is inconsistent with the declaration he has just read from the constitution of Massachusetts? If he does not deem it inconsistent, by what authority does he affirm that in reminding him of it I have said anything inconsistent with the enactments of the constitution of Massachusetts?

Mr. WHYTE. I did not say that the declaration in the constitution of Massachusetts was inconsistent with what was stated by Charles Carroll, of Maryland, but I was speaking of those who deny the sovereign rights of the State——

Mr. HOAR. Not by me.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator from Massachusetts, as I understood him, has been maintaining all along that our maintaining the rights of the States here was a raid upon the General Government; that it was revolutionary, and put us all in the position of raising our hands against the Government because we maintain these doctrines as perfectly consistent with the general form of government which was created for the common good of all.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if the honorable Senator will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly I will. I want to be courteous to the Senator from Massachusetts. He will understand me as not meaning to be discourteous in any way.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly. What I have arraigned the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber for in this debate is for an utterance from which I understood the Senator from Maryland to express his own personal dissent at the time it was made, to wit, a threat that if the President of the United States did not yield his opinion in regard to the propriety of certain laws, and sign his name testifying his approval of measures that he did not approve, the Government should be stopped. I have not discussed at any time the extent of the claim of State sovereignty. Now, when the Senator from Maryland a little while ago reproached the republican party because some person whom he supposed to represent its opinions had said in a pamphlet from which he read that we were a nation before the Constitution, I asked him whether that statement was not in substance the statement of the Declaration of Independence that we were one people—if it was not in substance, if the Senator will permit me to read one sentence from the proclamation of General Jackson—

Under the royal government we had no separate character. Our opposition and its operations began as united colonies. We were the United States under the confederation, and the name was perpetuated, the Union rendered more perfect, by the Federal Constitution. In none of these stages—

Revolution, confederacy, or constitutional life—

In none of these stages did we consider ourselves in any other light than as forming one nation.

Now, the Senator from Maryland when he attacks this utterance of the Senator from Minnesota, if it was his speech from which he read, is attacking the proclamation of Andrew Jackson, written under the inspiration of Roger B. Taney. I repeat the only contribution I have made to this debate is to denounce this act of taking the Government by the throat and declaring that the will of a simple majority in one or both Houses of Congress shall pass into law over the objections of the President, or the Government stop; and will the Senator from Maryland express his dissent from a single word I uttered on that occasion—from one word?

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I did not intend to take up so much time because I know there are other Senators who desire to speak; nor am I going to undertake to answer the Senator from Massachusetts in the speech that he delivered some time ago in the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. But the Senator will pardon me. The Senator has made of his own accord a personal charge upon me that, as a Senator from Massachusetts, I had repudiated the doctrine laid down in the constitution of my State which fifty times I have sworn to support, and I asked him for his authority for making that very serious personal charge against me, and he replies that his authority is a speech that I made early in this debate; and then having stated what I said in that speech and all I said, I asked him if he dissents from one word of it. He now replies that he is not going to answer the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts to which he refers.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I made no personal attack upon the Senator from Massachusetts and did not intend any discourtesy to him, but they are getting wonderfully sensitive on that side of the Chamber. Gentlemen who sit in the seats over here can be held up to public scorn, as if we were a set of conspirators, preparing with red hands and "bloody shirts" to tear down the fabric of our common Government. We are told that we are secessionists because we speak of the reserved rights of the States. We are rebuked for our very presence upon this floor, as if we were committing some outrage upon public decency because we represent our States in this Chamber. Everything that can be uttered calculated to degrade us in the eyes of the people of the North is said against us, and whenever we say one word that touches the tender skin of some gentleman on the other side it is charged as being a personal attack.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) Does the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. WHYTE. I prefer to make my own speech now.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to say to the Senator that he has unintentionally misrepresented me, and I wish to know if he wants to continue it.

Mr. WHYTE. Then I certainly give way.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator can find any place in my speech where I charge him or any other gentleman on the other side with being a secessionist, I should like him to find it. I said this, that the effort was to reinstate "the old secession doctrine of State sovereignty." Then I stated further by quoting from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] that the issue which brought on the rebellion was State rights and nationality; I admitted, as he stated, that secession was dead, but I said that the two antagonists still lived and that this effort was to re-enforce the old State-rights doctrine, but I never said they were secessionists.

Further, while on my feet, if the Senator will allow me to correct both, I wish to remark that I did not say the States were mere corporations. Does not the Senator admit that a State is a political corporation? I merely described the States as corporations. I think the Senator agrees with me that they are political corporations.

Mr. WHYTE. "At the mercy of corporations known as sovereign States." I do not believe that sovereign States are corporations in any such sense as claimed by the Senator.

Mr. WINDOM. I have not said they are mere corporations.

Mr. WHYTE. They are not corporations in my apprehension of the word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHYTE. Now, my friend must be very keen. The salubrious air of Minnesota, I know, sharpens one's wits, and that is a brilliant distinction, "a distinction without a difference," which charges a man who maintains the doctrine of State sovereignty as being one who revives secession doctrine, and yet not charging him with being a secessionist.

Mr. WINDOM. Let me ask the Senator if that was not a secession doctrine?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. State sovereignty was not?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. What was?

Mr. WHYTE. The right of a State to secede. That was the doctrine of the secessionist. That is all.

Mr. WINDOM. Was not secession used as the instrument for carrying out that very doctrine?

Mr. WHYTE. Secession was the act. The doctrine of secession was that the States had the right to secede.

Mr. WINDOM. But was it not based on the idea of State sovereignty or State rights?

Mr. WHYTE. Of course it was based upon the theory of a confederacy of States, which I have never maintained to be correct here or elsewhere. I repudiated the doctrine of secession, and I am not one of those "brigadiers" who have changed and now deny that they were secessionists to whom the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] referred when he tauntingly said that no man was a secessionist nowadays. I never was a secessionist, never believed in that doctrine, never took part in any movement looking to it, but never faltered in my belief of that State sovereignty which maintained that the rights of the States were reserved in every respect except where they were delegated by the written Constitution to the United States—a doctrine I shall teach to my children as long as my life lasts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So shall I.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask the Senator who differs with him?

Mr. WHYTE. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland declines to yield.

Mr. WHYTE. I think the old Bay State has had its day in court. Let me get through.

Mr. DAWES. I wanted to know of the Senator who he supposed differed with him in that form of statement?

Mr. WHYTE. I cannot, Mr. President, tell who differs with me. All I can tell is that I read the speeches of gentlemen proclaiming that this is a nation and the States are mere corporations inside the nation, and that that is the doctrine of the republican party; and I called upon Senators of the republican party to deny if it is not so, because if we are all State-rights people, then we are quarreling about nothing.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, I will yield. What is the use of being churlish. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator says he reads from speeches of republicans that they say this is a nation and the States are mere corporations inside of the nation. I should like to ask him what speech of any republican on this side of the Chamber does he read from?

Mr. WHYTE. I cited the speech of the Senator from Minnesota. Here it is right before my eye.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator be kind enough to repeat that statement?

Mr. WHYTE. Oh, no. I have read it once. I will not repeat it. I will only say to the Senator from Massachusetts that it is very pleasant reading, and I will send it to him.

Mr. DAWES. Has the Senator not heard the Senator from Minnesota, not five minutes ago, declare that he had said no such thing?

Mr. WHYTE. I heard him say it now; certainly I did; but I read it in his speech. He has corrected it. I read it here in the speech.

Mr. HOAR. Did not the Senator put in the word "mere?"

Mr. WHYTE. So I did. It does not make it a bit stronger calling a State "a mere corporation."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then leave out the "mere."

Mr. WHYTE. I will leave it out.

Mr. DAWES. It is quite as good a way to state it as it was stated and printed. That is quite as good a way as any other.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly, I do not want to drive my friends into a corner. I will give them the privilege of striking the "mere" out and leaving the statement that the States are corporations contributing to the great nation of the United States without a constitution. "The machine runs of itself without having anybody to guide it! The nation runs itself without a constitution! It is just as good with or without a constitution," according to the doctrines of the republicans whose speeches I have read! These are their views of our constitutional Government.

In the Massachusetts convention Mr. Samuel Adams thus spoke of the tenth article of amendments in regard to the reserved rights of the States, those State rights which we claim still belong to the States:

> It is consonant with the second article in the present confederation that each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this confederation—

That is what Mr. Samuel Adams called the constitution or the Union of the States—> by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled.

And Henry Clay, when he voted for four of Mr. Calhoun's abstract resolutions in 1838 in regard to our form of government, expressly stated "that the historical fact was that the Constitution was adopted by the people of the several States acting within their respective limits." All of these great men of the past deemed the Union under the Constitution as composed of a number of political societies, that is, the people of the several States, and not of the whole mass of the people of the United States, territorially considered as one nation. We are not a nation in that light.

Let me add another to the worthies who deemed it no disgrace to maintain this theory of our Government. Edward Everett, in his famous oration on the "History of Liberty," delivered at Charlestown, July 4, 1828, thus speaks of our form of government:

> The framers of the Constitution devised a scheme of confederate and representative sovereign republics, united in a happy distribution of powers, which, reserving to the separate States all the political functions essential to local administration and private justice, bestowed upon the General Government those, and those only, required for the service of the whole.

And again, in his oration on American Constitutions, at Cambridge, July 4, 1826, he thus describes the Union:

> In framing a government for the Union consisting of sovereign States independent of each other a happy compromise was resorted to. An equal representation in the Senate was given to each State. The other House of Congress was established on the principle of proportionate numbers. On the same principle it was provided that the Executive should be chosen according to a plan in which regard is had both to the equality of the States and to numerical majority; and the powers and functions of each branch of the Government are defined by a written Constitution. There is our form of government as I understand it. "Thus was organized," said Mr. Everett, "a family of States associated in a confederate union which, if anything human is entitled to that name, may be called a perfect form of government."

"A family of States associated in a confederate union." Mark the words. And whatever may be said of Mr. Webster's great speech in reply to Mr. Calhoun, in which he maintained that the Union was not a mere league of States, he never consented to the idea of a consolidated national government. So far from it, speaking of the union of the colonies against Great Britain, Mr. Webster, in a speech at Annapolis, March, 1851, said:

> Why, it never entered into their conceptions that they were to consolidate themselves into one integral government; that they would cease to be Virginia, Maryland, Massachusetts, and Carolina. Not at all.

And referring again to their later confederation he said:

> Did they seek to merge and confound and consolidate all these States into one great community? No such thing. * * * Their association was political. It was founded on general policy and union; a sort of confederacy at that time to resist the common enemy and to do what was necessary for the common good. Gentlemen, I hope for one never to see this original idea departed from.

A nation indeed, instead of a union of political societies known as States; and as I read the history of the past, I can draw no other conclusion but that this is a confederated republic, in which the constituent parts are made up of the people within the limits of the several States, as contradistinguished from a national consolidated republic, in which the constituent parts were the aggregate mass of the American people taken collectively. To repeat, the facts in brief are these: the Constitution was framed by a convention, the delegates to which were chosen by the Legislatures of the several States; it was then submitted to Congress, and by it submitted to the several States to be voted on, not by the Legislatures of the States, but by conventions of the people of the several States, each acting separately and by itself, and being ratified by a sufficient number of such State conventions it became the Constitution of the people of the United States. Thus the people of the several States, the political societies known as States, exercising all the powers of sovereignty, entered into this "more perfect Union" under which we live.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what is the difference between a political society known as a State and a corporation known as a State?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir, there is a very great difference. The political society is composed of the sovereign people. There is no such thing as a corporation of the State. It is the government of the State which is represented by what the Senator from Minnesota pleases to call a corporation.

What is that Union?

said Mr. Pinkney, of Maryland, in his speech in this body on the Missouri compromise:

A confederation of States, equal in sovereignty, capable of everything which the Constitution does not forbid or authorize Congress to forbid. It is an equal union between parties equally sovereign.

With these lights to guide us, let none of these latter-day patriots and doctors of constitutional law tell us it is treason to speak of State sovereignty and the reserved rights of the States. Sovereignty is lodged with the States, where it had its home long before the Constitution was created. The Constitution is the creature of that sovereignty. The Federal Government has no inherent sovereignty. All its sovereign powers are drawn from the States, and as it has been well said, like the bridge spanning a mighty river, it rests upon the pillars of the States. Destroy these fundamental supports, and the superstructure crumbles into dust.

Thus I have endeavored to make my conception of this Constitution clear to myself, if not clear to others. I have tried to say nothing to irritate any gentleman who holds contrary opinions on this important question. If I have done so, it has been through a slip of my tongue unintentionally, because I do not think this question ought to be discussed with temper and in passion, but it ought to be considered as our constituents expect us to debate such questions, leaving it for reason to overcome error when it is maintained on this floor.

I would not have spoken at all if the debate had not drifted from the peculiar measures contained in this bill into the doctrine of State sovereignty and State rights. I believe the doctrine of the reserved rights of the States and the sovereignty of the States in all that is not delegated to Congress to be the surest guarantee for the future prosperity of the Union. I deem it the duty of every member of the Federal Legislature, thinking as I do, to keep constantly in view of the people the reserved rights of the States, and especially whenever the attempt is made to advance the centralizing tendencies to which some republican Senators cling with ardent devotion it is incumbent on all who believe in the doctrine that the Government is the creature of the States, to which certain powers only have been granted to resist all encroachments upon the legitimate sphere of State sovereignty.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion, the issue is a square one between the two great parties, and if any revolution is going on at all it is the same kind of revolution in public sentiment which swept from power John Adams and the Federal party with their alien and sedition laws and established in their places Thomas Jefferson and his followers.

The war did not change our form of government. It settled the question of secession and slavery, but it did not disturb the harmony of our political system. It was fought for the Union, and its triumph was achieved in the name of the Union, and in spite of all legal impediments to restoration inside and outside of the Constitution it has been restored in all its integrity in every corner of this broad land, where now and forever it shall represent to the civilized world "liberty protected by law." Peace has resumed her sway, and the day for the soldier has passed. Therefore I voted to repeal the law which allows the use of the soldier at the polls. In time of peace his movements are watched with jealousy by a free people. They remember that armies which had been raised in other lands to protect the people in the enjoyment of freedom have been used as an engine of despotism to build empires upon the ruins of liberty. As early as 1793 the House of Representatives had its attention called to this question of military at the polls in the Trigg and Preston case, and in 1800 the House took this action in the premises:

In the House of Representatives, 13th February, 1800, on motion,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill containing such legislative provisions as may be judged expedient, either for removing any military force of the United States from the places of holding elections, or for preventing the interference of any such force with said elections; and that Mr. Marshall, Mr. Leib, and Mr. Otis do prepare and bring in the same.

What would our fathers have thought when they prepared a resolution like that if they had been told that they were getting up a scheme to strike at the freedom of elections?

Mr. EATON. Destroying the right arm of the Government.

Mr. WHYTE. And destroying our institutions because we wanted the soldiers kept away from the polls.

February 18.—Mr. Marshall, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill for removing any military force of the United States from the places of holding elections—

Our fathers did not make a point on "place." No Senator, no member of the House, John Marshall himself, never rose in his place and made the astute point as made by the President that "place" was a very large word and might mean a whole city or anywhere else; but the language of the bill reported by John Marshall was to remove the military force of the United States "from the places of holding elections"— which was received and read the first time.

On motion, the said bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

March 13.—The bill, with some amendments, was ordered to be engrossed, and on the 14th it was passed and sent to the Senate. On the 4th of April the Senate reported their disagreement to it, and there were no further proceedings on the bill.

Now, there was a bill reported by John Marshall on this subject. Nobody thought that was treason.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator got a copy of the bill reported by Marshall?

Mr. WHYTE. I have not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator would send to the files and get it. I should like to see it compared with the performance we have had a little while ago.

Mr. WHYTE. I have not seen any performance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You felt it, certainly, participated in it.

Mr. WHYTE. On the contrary I am afraid my friend must have felt it if he observed it, for I did not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator does not understand me as referring to anything that occurred in his speech.

Mr. WHYTE. I thought the Senator did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no!

Mr. WHYTE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps I used the word "performance" improperly. I referred to the events of the present so-called Army bill.

Mr. WHYTE. I beg pardon; I misunderstood the remark.

Now, then, Mr. President, I say that following the example set by the distinguished John Marshall we have only asked to keep the military away from the polls. There is no crime in that. According to my apprehension, we are only following in footprints that it would be wise for others to walk in.

But, Mr. President, the soldier's day has gone. He has done his work bravely. The sword has been sheathed. The civil authority comes upon the stage now; the military goes into the fortifications and on the frontiers and wherever else it may be necessary to protect our land from foreign invasion, and to be ready at the call under the Constitution and the provisions of law to suppress domestic violence and insurrection in the States.

Let me commend to the leaders of the republican party to-day the language of one in his last utterances to the people of that city who honored him as rarely man was honored before, and toward whom at least Faneuil Hall's doors never grated on their hinges; for he was looked upon as the apostle of liberty and the great friend of the black man, who thought and labored and struggled for his freedom. Let us hear what he said about the day of the soldier being past. I refer to the last address of Charles Sumner to the people of Boston:

Reconstruction is now complete. Every State is represented in the Senate, and every district is represented in the House of Representatives. Every Senator and every Representative is in his place. There are no vacant seats in either Chamber, and among the members are fellow-citizens of the African race. And amnesty nearly universal has been adopted. In this condition of things I find new reason for change. The present incumbent knows little of our frame of government. By military education and military genius he represents the idea of force; nor is he any exception to the rule of his profession, which appreciates only slightly a government that is not arbitrary. The time for the soldier has passed, especially when his renewed power would once more remind fellow-citizens of their defeat.

Think how tenderly he spoke of those whom he considered his vanquished southern brethren:

Victory over fellow-citizens should be known only in the rights it assures; nor should it be flaunted in the face of the vanquished. It should not be inscribed on regimental colors or portrayed in pictures at the national capital. But the present incumbent is a regimental color with the forbidden inscription; he is a picture at the national capital recalling victories over fellow-citizens. It is doubtful if such a presence can promote true reconciliation. Friendship does not grow where former differences are thrust in sight. There are wounds of the mind as of the body; these too must be healed. Instead of irritation and pressure let there be gentleness and generosity. Men in this world get only what they give—prejudice for prejudice; animosity for animosity; hate for hate. Likewise confidence is returned for confidence; good-will is returned for good-will; friendship is returned for friendship. On this rule, which is the same for the nation as for the individual, I would now act. So will the Republic be elevated to new heights of moral grandeur, and our people will manifest that virtue "greatest of all" which is found in charity. Above the conquest of others will be the conquest of ourselves. Nor will any fellow-citizen suffer in rights; but all will find new safeguard in the comprehensive fellowship.

I commend this to my friends upon the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS obtained the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator from Vermont yield for just one minute?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the first place I want to ask unanimous consent that the understanding of yesterday for four o'clock be abandoned. I was called out of the Senate Chamber yesterday for less than five minutes I think; and came back and found that such an understanding had been made, which I always oppose. I understand that some of our friends on the other side who have not had an opportunity to speak desire to do so. I should like to occupy a little while myself, not very long; but nobody can tell, when he begins with a speech that is not written, how long it will take, and I feel an embarrassment in going on at all when I know that gentlemen who have not trespassed upon the patience of the Senate, as I have, desire to speak. Therefore, inasmuch as nobody is talking against time, but is wishing to say something to contribute to the propriety of our action, I hope that there may be an understanding that the debate shall go on until we take a vote, without regard to four o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks that the understanding had yesterday that debate close at four o'clock to-day may be abandoned. Does the Chair hear any objection?

Mr. BECK. If the Senator chooses to fix any other hour I do not care particularly about four o'clock; but I hope we shall come to a vote to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, so do I, to-day. I will vote against all adjournments until this matter is ended. I would have done the same yesterday.

Mr. BECK. Five o'clock would be probably satisfactory to the Senator. Suppose we try it till four o'clock, and then if Senators wish to speak further there will be no objection to going on with the debate an hour longer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My objection to a specific hour is that I do not think it right on either side of the Chamber to cut off arbitrarily by an understanding gentlemen who desire to say something. But the public business ought to go on, and I am ready to stay here until it is done. I make this suggestion, having the floor, and, therefore, having the power to say what I wish to say; but I do not think it right and fair to cut off gentlemen who have not spoken at all in these debates. That is why I make the suggestion.

Mr. BECK. Yesterday morning I did not make the proposition with a view to cut off debate. I asked the Senate whether they would give unanimous consent to vote at four o'clock to-day, and after a little delay everybody agreed to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I happened to be out for the moment, or I should not have consented. I am sure there can be an understanding that we will stay here until the bill is done; but I do not think it courteous to gentlemen who have not had an opportunity to speak at all to close the debate at four o'clock to-day.

Mr. BECK. If that course is agreeable to Senators, it is perfectly agreeable to me. All I desire is to close the debate and reach a vote to-day.

Mr. BLAINE. What is the need of our rushing ourselves into a night session? I do not want the bill to occupy more time than to-day or to-morrow, but why should we needlessly involve that which is very uncomfortable to everybody; and why should the debate close to-day rather than to-morrow?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; let us finish it.

Mr. BECK. The agreement was arrived at yesterday, apparently to the satisfaction of everybody.

Mr. BLAINE. If the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont is agreed to, it means that we are going to be here all night to-night.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, it does not mean any such thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to abandoning the understanding? Senators have control of the subject.

Mr. BECK. With the understanding that the debate shall close to-day before we adjourn, I shall not object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will stand by the Senator in that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I rise to suggest that we finish the bill to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that is a very unwise thing to do.

Mr. HOAR. I do not desire to interpose in anything that the Senator from Vermont knows better than I do what is expedient, but I should be sorry indeed to have an understanding that we must at any rate close the debate to-day, because that makes a night session certain. I should very much prefer to have a fixed hour to-morrow or a fixed hour to-night for taking the vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will never agree to any fixed hour, when I am here.

Mr. BECK. I am willing to fix five, six, or seven o'clock—any hour on which gentlemen may agree.

Mr. CONKLING. May I be allowed to make a suggestion? Like the Senator from Vermont I happened to be absent from the Chamber at the moment when consent was given, as I hear it was, that at four o'clock to-day the vote should be taken. I was sorry for it, for although it had been my purpose to make a few observations about the pending measure, I can readily forego that, and I shall do so with great pleasure. The Senator from Vermont wants to say something and the Senate wants to hear him. More than that, I think when no disposition is evinced to debate for the sake of consuming time, the Senate in theory and in practice is willing to hear any Senator who wishes to make observations pertinent to a matter upon which a vote is to be taken. But I hope that we shall not be driven into a night session in order that any Senator may be allowed to express himself. If we go on until the customary hour to-day and the debate shall not have closed, let it go over until to-morrow, and if there be a Senator then who has not concluded let him conclude to-morrow, and let us vote as expeditiously as we may; but I concur with other Senators who have said that it is hardly worth while to incommode ourselves for nothing. This bill has been amended already; it is to go back to the House in any event; and nobody can say that by voting to-night rather than to-morrow one moment's time will be gained in the final disposition of the bill.

Therefore I hope the Senator from Kentucky will allow Senators to proceed to-day who wish to do so, and if the debate is not concluded let it go over until to-morrow, whether we vote an hour sooner or an hour later when to-morrow comes. I say again that I am as anxious to have the bill disposed of as I think anybody can be, but I hope we shall not be driven into a night session in order that the customary opportunities of debate may be afforded.

Mr. BECK. I have only this to say: I have no idea that we shall be driven to a very late session. Unless some other gentlemen want to speak than those I have heard of, I think the debate can be closed to-day to a certainty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has agreed to rescind the arrangement by which debate closes at four o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. With an additional understanding that we sit it out this evening, as I understand the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not understand it so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent has been given to the rescinding of the hour fixed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand that four o'clock is fixed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; that has been dispensed with.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I submit that there is now one unanimous consent and understanding. If Senators want it to go over for another day, I submit to the Senator from Kentucky, who has charge of the bill, to say what he expects the Senate to do.

Mr. BECK. I have said that I desire as full debate as possible; but I desire a vote before the Senate adjourns to-day, and I will give no consent that does not bring about that result. The Senate may vote me down if they desire.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do I understand to be the understanding now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The four o'clock to-day understanding has been dispensed with.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all. That was not submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding that debate was to close at four o'clock to-day has been dispensed with.

Mr. BLAINE. That was not submitted to the Senate, surely.

Mr. CONKLING. There was general consent to it, however, including the Senator from Kentucky, as I understood ——

Mr. HOAR. The last thing I understood the Senator from Kentucky to say was that he would give no consent.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Kentucky now says he only waives four o'clock on condition that we sit the bill out. I never consented to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not include that statement that the understanding was that the bill should be sat out; but the Senator from Kentucky so consented to dispensing with the arrangement for closing the debate at four o'clock.

Mr. BLAINE. But the other Senators had the same right of assenting that the Senator from Kentucky had.

Mr. BECK. If the other condition is assented to, I agree to that; otherwise not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if the last utterance of the Senator from Kentucky was not that he would give no consent which did not involve the taking of the vote on the bill to-night?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly he said that.

Mr. BECK. I repeat that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands him now.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody has consented to that condition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand that the four o'clock understanding is not dispensed with?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, Mr. President, I certainly shall not take the floor because I know Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are new Senators here, who have not trespassed upon the time of the Senate at all, wish to speak, and I do not think it fair that I should take the time necessary for what I wish to say to their exclusion.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, nor do I think it fair that I should occupy any time with observations of my own; but I will venture, at the cost of only a very few moments, to read a passage or two from the volume cited by the honorable Senator from Maryland who so recently took his seat, [Mr. WHYTE,] the volume of contested elections from 1789 to 1834.

The contested-election case to which he referred arose at the first session of the Third Congress in 1793. The honorable Senator was pleased to read, and he read with great propriety of course, a very brief note in small type at the foot of one of these pages; and a question put by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS,] to which I will refer again for a moment before I sit down, drew or was intended to draw attention to the vague and inconclusive statement contained in this note. My purpose is to apprise the Senate and those who may read our proceedings, of the occasion, the exigency with which Congress was in truth then dealing.

A petition had been presented by one of the contestants, and the statement of the case opens with a résumé of that petition. Now I read from the report of the committee:

That Captain William Preston, brother and agent at the election of the sitting member, was quartered near Montgomery court-house with about sixty or seventy Federal troops, of which he had the command. That, on the day of election, the said troops were marched, in a body, twice or three times around the court-house, and paraded in front of and close to the door thereof. That, toward the close of the election, the said troops were polled generally in favor of the sitting member; but their votes were put down on a separate paper, and, after the election, at the comparison of the polls of the respective counties, were rejected by the returning officers. That some of them—

That is, the troops—

threatened to beat any person who should vote in favor of the petitioner. That one of the soldiers struck and knocked down a magistrate who was attending at the said election. That three soldiers stood at the door of the court-house, and refused to admit a voter because he declared he would vote for the petitioner. That many of the country people were dissatisfied with the conduct of the soldiers, which produced altercations at the election between the soldiers and the country people, the former being generally for the sitting member, and the latter for the petitioner, and terminated in a violent affray between them after the poll was closed. That some of the soldiers being afterward interrogated why they said they would beat any man who voted for Trigg, replied, "they who are bound must obey."

That is in quotation marks, purporting to be the very language in which the troops made apology for what they had done. "They who are bound must obey."

That, though it is doubtful whether any of the soldiers were armed at the court-house, yet it appears that at the time of the affray, after the election, Captain Preston had a sword and dagger; and that when the soldiers, being overpowered by the country people, retreated to their barracks, some guns were fired by the soldiers toward the country people.

The committee, on full consideration of all the evidence in relation to Montgomery County, from which the foregoing facts result, are of opinion that, notwithstanding the soldiers were not disfranchised of the right of voting, merely as such, yet their conduct as well as that of their commander was inconsistent with that freedom and fairness which ought to prevail at elections.

I venture to ask the astute Senator from Maryland to mark—

Are of opinion that, notwithstanding the soldiers were not disfranchised of the right of voting, merely as such, yet their conduct as well as that of their commander—

Not the fact or circumstance that they happened to be there or near there, but their conduct as well as that of their commander—was inconsistent with that freedom and fairness which ought to prevail at elections; and that although it does not appear, from any other than hearsay testimony, that any voter was actually prevented from voting, yet there is every reasonable ground to believe that some were, and that the election was unduly and unfairly biased by the turbulent and menacing conduct of the military; and that the petitioner, who only lost his election by a majority of 10 votes, has not had that fair opportunity of obtaining the suffrages of the people of that district to which every candidate is entitled. The committee, therefore, viewing the precedent as a dangerous one, and considering the inestimable privilege of free suffrage ought never to be violated by any military interposition; that the sitting member may have obtained a majority by improper influence, and that the petitioner ought to have a chance of obtaining a seat on equal terms, are of opinion that Francis Preston is not duly elected a member of this House.

Without recapitulating, the Senate will see that there was a case where the brother of the candidate and his agent, wearing a sword and dagger and commanding a military force, brought that force actually to the court-house, paraded them at different hours of the day thrice around the court-house, and they in his presence declared that they would maltreat and beat any man who voted for his competitor. They blocked the way and refused to allow men to go to the polls because they thought they would vote for the competitor, and so on. In commenting on that the committee say that the conduct of these men was improper, and at the end of the statement appears that which the honorable Senator has read, and which, as it is brief, I will venture to read again as a part of this history:

House of Representatives, 13th February, 1800——

Mr. WHYTE. If I do not interrupt the Senator, he will observe that these proceedings took place seven years afterward.

Mr. CONKLING. I was going to observe that it was afterward, as the date shows, this having become matter of record in the House, being quite notorious in the country, having occurred in the State of Virginia, the State from which Marshall came, and, as this collator thought, being an event cognate to this transaction, because he puts it as a note in the midst of the statement of the case:

In the House of Representatives, 13th February, 1800, on motion,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill containing such legislative provisions as may be judged expedient, either for removing any military force of the United States from the places of holding elections, or for preventing the interference of any such force with said elections; and that Mr. Marshall, Mr. Leib, and Mr. Otis, do prepare and bring in the same.

February 18.—Mr. Marshall, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill for removing any military force of the United States from the places of holding elections; which was received, and read the first time.

On motion, the said bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next. (See Journal, vol. 3, pp. 591, 593.)

March 13.—The bill, with some amendments, was ordered to be engrossed, and on the 14th it was passed and sent to the Senate. On the 4th of April the Senate reported their disagreement to it, and there were no further proceedings on the bill.

Because the Senate did refuse to agree to that bill, I remark first that it is the only instance which any Senator has been able to find of an attempt by either House to do that which we are told now is and always was of such supreme urgent importance; second, that when a wrong so flagrant, so monstrous as this, not consisting at all in the presence of soldiers near by a building in which a poll was being held, but consisting in the actual forcible presence and interference by violence, lawless, shameful violence with an election, proceeding so far as an assault, the striking down of one of the magistrates at the election,—when all that had occurred, the men in the two houses, in whose presence, officially and legally speaking, all this took place, men belonging to the same generation which had been shocked by such an enormity, in this branch of Congress refused even on that inducement to vote for a bill which, containing amendments not here set out, seems to have provided for removing troops or preventing their lawless interference with elections. Even that bill, on such an emergency, moved by such an occasion, received the disapprobation of the Senate. I will not say that I think it should have received the disapprobation of the Senate; my opinion in that regard is of very little value. I will say, however, that whenever any military commander, wear he a sword and dagger or not, have he troops with him or not, shall do one-tenth part of the wrong there recorded, if I am here and the honorable Senator from Maryland is here, I will join with him and I will follow wherever he will lead in voting for a bill to punish, to chastise when it occurs, and to prevent the occurrence of so shameful and abominable a wrong. And my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] reminds me—I am glad he does, for it might have escaped me—that such a provision as I have pledged myself to vote for with the Senator from Maryland is already on the statute-book, more than once on the statute-book, but sufficiently on the statute-book in the very act of 1865 which a united majority in each House has struggled so hard to break down. Under that very statute of 1865, had it been in existence, Mr. Preston and the men with him, jointly or severally could have been indicted and punished with imprisonment as long as five years. Yet we are asked to strike down a statute under which this act could have been punished, and the proceeding punishable under it is cited as a reason why it should fall.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I shall occupy the floor but a minute, and I would not take it under the circumstances but that I want to read three short sentences for the information of my honorable friend from Maryland. He criticised quite vigorously in his speech this sentence from a speech I had the honor to deliver the other day when, speaking of the American people, I said:

They believe that the great lesson taught by the rebellion was, that ours is a nation existing not at the mercy of corporations known as sovereign States, but by the imperial will and pleasure of the sovereign people of the United States, who ordained and established its Constitution.

The part of that sentence which my friend criticises is that in which I designate the sovereign States as corporations, and he asserts very vehemently and earnestly that the States are not corporations. I want to read him three sentences from Bouvier's Law Dictionary, page 347:

Nations or states are denominated by publicists, bodies-politic, and are said to have their affairs and interests and to deliberate and resolve in common. They thus become as moral persons, having an understanding and will peculiar to themselves, and are susceptible of obligations and laws. (Vattel, 49.) In this extensive sense the United States may be termed a corporation; and so may each State singly. (Per Iredell, J., 3 Dall., 447.)

Thus it appears that the Supreme Court have decided that the States are corporations, and the Senator cannot very severely criticise me for describing them in that way, and I call attention to the fact that the judge deciding it was a North Carolina judge. So I think I am justified in describing the States as corporations. I did not say, as quoted by the Senator, "mere corporations," but used that merely to describe what I meant by the States.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, the pending questions have been so fully discussed in all their legal and constitutional bearings, both in this Chamber and at the other end of the Capitol, that I should prefer to content myself with casting a silent vote, had it not been that the State and people I represent have been frequently alluded to and, as I consider, frequently misrepresented during the course of the debate.

I consider, Mr. President, that with the exception of the repeal of the test oath for jurors, the people of the Northern and Western States are far more interested in the pending questions than the people of the South, except that the people of the South have an interest in common with the people of the whole country in the preservation of its free government and institutions, and the liberties of its people.

Mr. President, so far as elections are concerned the peril has passed from the South and been transferred to the North. In the South we no longer have returning boards, we no longer have election machinery by which the will of the people can be subverted, and we can no longer be controlled even by the bayonet policy, should it be restored to the country, because our people, white and colored, are nearly solid, as has been charged, in their support of the democratic party, and they will continue to be as long as the democratic party is antagonized merely by the issues of the war; so long as it is antagonized by issues of hate; so long as it is antagonized by mere sectionalism; so long as it is antagonized by the issues which form the pabulum and political capital of the republican party. Should these issues be varied or withdrawn from the canvass; should the dead past be consigned to its grave; should we be permitted to consider the country once again united, and, waiving these subjects which are perpetually revived as causes of dissension and bitter memories, be permitted once more to indulge in the discussion of questions of purely domestic policy, I see very easily that the South might cease to be solid and might be divided into parties again, as it used to be in the days when there were two good old constitutional parties in this country, the whig and the democratic parties; when father and son and brothers were divided in politics, and when, after the contest was over and the electoral battle had been fought and won, each felt, whichever party succeeded, that the country was safe in the hands of those who had been intrusted with the administration of its Government.

Mr. President, the republican party having failed to control and solidify the South seeks now to control and solidify the North. It seeks to use the bayonet policy, Federal machinery, and Federal supervisors to control those great and evenly balanced States of the North and the West upon whose decision hangs the result of the election for President and for Representatives in the lower branch of Congress, hereafter; and for the purpose of warning the people of the North and West of the danger which threatens them in the use and abuse of the laws which we now seek to repeal, I wish to give them a few chapters from the history of bayonet rule in my State; and in doing so I do not intend to go back to the war. What was done during the war I am not here to discuss. I was away from my State during most of its duration, and I have never yet heard a sensible man complain of any act of war committed while the Federal Army was in the occupation of its territory. When men go to war they do not do so as children; and the people of the South, when they accepted that arbitrament, did it with a knowledge of all its responsibilities; and therefore what was done under martial law and military orders, when armies were in possession of the soil of the State and when the power was wielded by military commanders, if done according to the rules and usages of war, forms no subject of complaint either here or elsewhere.

I find no man in the South to complain of the loss of property, no man to complain of the manumission of his slaves, no man to complain of the misfortunes which war brought upon him, no man to complain of the ruin which was inflicted by the war or by the act of hostile armies. Those things were acts of war. Our people accepted its responsibilities and they met its losses, and from the moment they were realized and peace was restored they started as brave men to build anew the fortunes which had been destroyed, without weeping over a past which they sought to bury.

Nor do I intend to refer to the reconstruction elections, although they were notoriously carried on under the influence and authority of the bayonet; although in every Southern State the will of the people was subverted; although a large mass of voters was excluded from the polls, and although the final result was not satisfactory nor according to the will of the people who were to live under those governments.

I propose to take simply the history of my State from the day when she was reorganized and reconstructed as it is called, and from the day when representatives or so-called representatives from her people sat upon the floor of this House and of the other Chamber. I propose first to speak of the election of 1868 for President and Vice-President and Congressmen, as a contrast to those which afterward followed. Although the State was at the time full of troops, yet on that single occasion they were not used for the purpose of controlling the elections. Under the policy of Mr. Johnson and of the military commanders then in that section, the troops were held to the performance of their proper duties and the polls were unmolested and undisturbed by their presence; and the republican party which had carried the election for the convention, the State ticket, and the Legislature, in the June previous, by the aid of the military authorities, seeing that it was impossible to carry the election in the fall without them, adopted a different policy, called off their voters from the polls, and in the midst of perfect peace and quiet, they alleged that there was intimidation and force employed against them; that they could not go to the polls and cast a free ballot, and therefore they abstained in a large degree from voting; and instead of our carrying the State by twelve or fifteen thousand majority, we carried it by forty thousand because of republican abstention. Yet the Representatives to Congress defeated by the people were seated on the floor of the other House, and those who were elected were excluded.

I pass by the election of 1870 which was a mere farce, an election in which the then governor of the State confessed to have carried the State and to have counted in whom he pleased, by the use of his newly discovered election machinery, and I come to the election of 1872 when Mr. Greeley and General Grant were candidates for the Presidency, and when the liberal ticket and the republican ticket confronted each other in the State of Louisiana, and when John McEnery, the nominee of the liberal party, was elected governor of the State by a majority of over seven thousand and by a free, fair, and undisputed ballot where no man was disturbed, where no man was kept away from the polls, where not a single incident of disorder or disturbance occurred throughout the length and breadth of the State. He was elected, and was elected with a conservative Legislature. That Legislature came to the capital. The governor was ready to be inaugurated when, under the authority of an order obtained from a drunken Federal judge, granted at midnight and outside of his court, ordering the United States marshal to take possession of the capitol of the State and to inaugurate or, as a learned jurist calls it, to "impanel a Legislature and to inaugurate a governor," the United States bayonets were called to the aid of that marshal, and the people awoke to find their government wrested from them and in the hands of the judicial and military power of the United States Government. I was at that election chosen a State senator. I was returned elected both by the proper returning officers of the State who declared the McEnery ticket elected, and by the bogus returning board who professed to count in the other ticket. My election was undisputed, and on the day for the Legislature to assemble I proceeded to the State-house to take my seat in the Legislature. When I arrived at the door, accompanied by another senator who was not returned by the republican side, I found the door occupied by a United States lieutenant with his uniform and shoulder-straps on, his sword by his side, and a guard of two men with bayonets. When I asked for admission to the state-house this subaltern officer demanded my name, and when I told him my name and that I was a member of the State senate he examined the paper which he held in his hand, (which was Judge Durell's order enjoining certain parties from entering or taking their seats in the State Legislature and permitting others to do so) and informed me that I was not enjoined, and that the door was open for me to enter and take my seat, but that the gentleman by my side, a senator also returned by the proper returning officers with equal right to take his seat and sit beside me, was among those who were enjoined; and he was forbidden by this Federal officer protected by Federal bayonets from entering the state-house. Of course I never entered the door or took my seat by the grace of military permission.

Mr. President, it has been stated upon this floor that no Senator sitting on this side of the Chamber has ever seen a military force at the polls. I was not present when the assertion was made or I should have risen in my place to contradict it. I should have said that from the date of reconstruction till the spring of 1877 there had not been an election in Louisiana, there had not been a count of the vote, there had not been a return of a vote, there had not been an installation of an officer or an installation of a government, that had not been with the presence and under the overawing influence of Federal troops, and that had not been connived at and guaranteed by Federal and military authority; and the sight of troops at the polls during all that period was a familiar one to the people of New Orleans and to most of the other cities in Louisiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. JONAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will my colleague tell at what polls and at what elections troops were ever used in New Orleans?

Mr. JONAS. I do not designate the polls. I say that they were present, and present in the manner described.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does my colleague mean to say that they were in the city, or at the barracks below the city, or at the polls?

Mr. JONAS. I will say exactly what I mean, and the Senate will judge whether the gentleman's quibble of being "at the polls" will amount to anything. I say they were constructively at the polls and ready to be at the polls at a moment's notice. I say those elections were held with Federal troops quartered in the city of New Orleans with their guns unlimbered, with their men armed, with the horses harnessed to their batteries and ready at convenient distance to be placed at any poll in the city at a moment's notice, and I say these troops were constructively present in the view of all the people of New Orleans. I call them troops at the polls, for I say that if a hand was raised against what was done by "the powers that be," if a hand was raised against the returning board, if an effort was made to correct the count or require it to be a fair one, these troops were ready to support "the powers that be" with all their force, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. KELLOGG. My colleague says "constructively." Then I understand him to say according to his construction the troops were at the polls. I undertake to say that the troops never were within squares of any poll in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. JONAS. Within a square! I accept the gentleman's explanation. They may not have been nearer than a square.

Mr. KELLOGG. Within squares. They were at all times, at every election, to the best of my recollection, at their barracks or at their headquarters, and I have never known an instance where they came into the streets even or came out of their barracks or their regular appointed garrisons and headquarters on an election day.

Mr. JONAS. I will remind the gentleman of instances before I get through, and I say now that they were always either in the public square or in public places or at their barracks or quarters, within the city of New Orleans, ever ready to respond to military call, and military call was every ready to respond to the bidding of the gentleman. Those were the circumstances under which these elections were held.

Mr. President, the legal members of the legislature were refused admittance to the state-house, refused by a military officer supported by military bayonets; and here I take occasion to say that during all this time it made no difference how many bayonets there were or how many officers there were. The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] said there were but two hundred and thirty-seven troops in the State of Louisiana. I care not if there was but one, if there was but a single lieutenant with straps on his shoulders, provided he bore a commission, and provided he had orders to execute from the President. It was the military authority of the United States that we recognized. There was no disposition to oppose it. As long as a symbol of authority was there the people felt compelled to obey it; and a single soldier there to-day might in the course of a week become a thousand, five thousand, ten thousand, the United States Army.

In January, 1873, as I said, the Legislature was organized by military force; the governor was installed by military force. The President of the United States telegraphed to the military authorities to support and maintain this government; and the government elected by the people was overthrown and kept from office solely through the military power of the Government as wielded by its Commander-in-Chief.

We pass on, Mr. President. We endured military rule for two years longer. We were made to recognize a governor and State officers never chosen by the people; we were forced to acquiesce in legislation enacted by a Legislature which was not elected by the people, and whom even this body refused to recognize when that Legislature sent a Senator here and asked that he should have a seat on this floor. It will be remembered that this body refused to recognize the Kellogg legislature in the report made by its Committee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Mr. Pinchback and refused that gentleman a seat. In the House of Representatives, then largely republican, Mr. Sheridan, who was elected to Congress from the State at large, on the same ticket and by the same vote as Governor McEnery, was seated over Mr. Pinchback. Thus while both Houses of Congress refused to recognize the Kellogg government, it was yet upheld and maintained by the President with his bayonets.

We were compelled to obey the laws passed by this legislature and to live under a government never recognized by Congress, whose representatives were never seated in Congress, under officers who were not elected but counted in by fraud. I charge that the Kellogg officers and legislature were counted in without any returns at all, simply upon affidavits made by commissioners of election in different parts of the State. They were counted in by fraud and maintained in office by the President, with the aid of the military arm of the Government.

We pass on until 1874, when there was another election, when we had to elect a legislature and a State treasurer. In the summer of that year the acting State government grew strong in its own opinion; the troops had been removed; it considered itself so thoroughly planted in the hearts and affections of the people, or at least so firm in office, that it notified the President and notified the world that it no longer required military protection. It organized the police of the city of New Orleans, paid by the taxes of the people of that city, into a pretorian guard, into a battalion armed and officered and ready for war, by virtue of an act passed of that legislature; and this army was held at the convenience and orders of the governor to be sent to any portion of the State where he might desire to quell the people or to be used for the purpose of controlling the people at the polls; and confiding in the power and strength of this army, the acting governor thought fit to prevent the people of New Orleans from bearing arms, and issued an edict that no man should even exercise the right the Constitution gives him to bear and maintain arms and keep them in his own house, and an attempt was made through this armed police to disarm the citizens, to invade their houses and search for arms and to seize those arms which they had ordered from abroad for their own use, as they were authorized by the laws and Constitution of their country to do. The people of New Orleans, unable to bear this crowning outrage, determined to resist it. On the 14th of September, 1874, they arose, and in a single night this government, established by the bayonet and maintained by the bayonet alone, which had no hold in the hearts or affections of the people, vanished from existence. There was no governor, no legislature, no State officer, no vestige of the Kellogg government in the land. A single night had passed over it and it had vanished like an ugly dream. And, Mr. President, there was gratulation among the citizens of Louisiana. Those good citizens that my colleague says are so much attached to him and who support him in all his measures, those good citizens upon whom he relies at home for support and protection, those good citizens rejoiced at last that the dark shadow of usurpation and misrule had been removed from their State. The people arose in their majesty and installed in office for at least one brief day, the governor and State officers they had chosen nearly two years before by so large a majority.

That day was a day of happiness, a day of pride, a day when the people anticipated prosperity, when they anticipated some future for their State, for themselves, and their children; and when they fondly hoped that the legitimate government, now that it had demonstrated that it was the government of the people, would be permitted to remain in the exercise of its legitimate authority. But here came again the inevitable soldier. As soon as the wires could flash the message to Washington the soldier was ordered to go and demand the surrender of the government; and a single officer, in advance of the Army, entered the state-house and told Governor McEnery, "I am ordered by the United States Government to demand that you restore the possession of this capitol to Governor Kellogg." One single soldier was enough; the insignia of office was enough. All that the people had gained they gave up; all that the people had attained they surrendered. Once more by the power of the Federal Army, wielded by its Commander-in-Chief, the government of Kellogg, which has been proved to be a usurpation, a bubble, and a fraud, was placed in power; and then came the soldiers, then the battalions hurried and clattered down to New Orleans, though there was not one shadow of armed resistance; the people retired even before the approach of the soldiers; citizens who had risen and installed their government disbanded the moment that government was called upon to surrender. They could have been called together again, but there was no thought of resisting the United States Army.

They but wished to demonstrate to the people of this country that the Kellogg government was not founded in the hearts of the people, and that the Kellogg government alone could not last an hour unless it was supported and propped up by the bayonets of the United States Government. They had demonstrated this and were quite satisfied. The battalions came down and the ships of war were sent to New Orleans and anchored in front of that city with their batteries turned upon its streets, and for days there was all the grand panoply of war leveled against a people who had never dreamed of contesting the power of the bayonets and troops of the United States. That army remained there in great part until the election in November. That army at the election in November was quartered in the streets of the city, in its public squares, and in its public places. On the Sunday before the election in November both the troops and marines were brought out on dress parade on the great thoroughfare in New Orleans and exhibited to the people just before the people would be called upon to assemble at the polls; but, in despite of all this display, the democracy of Louisiana, as they always have done, carried the election and elected their State ticket and their Legislature by a large majority; and when they had done so here came the bayonets again. They elected their treasurer; he was counted out by the returning board. They elected their Legislature; the returning board got together and threw out enough of them to defeat the will of the people. Yet the Legislature assembled in the state-house and elected a democratic speaker and perfected a democratic organization, and they were proceeding to attend to the business of the State, when another spectacle was presented to the American people: While the speaker was in the chair and while the members were in the performance of legislative duties, a colonel of the United States Army, clad in full uniform, with epaulets, and with a sword belted to his side, accompanied by his staff and his orderly, entered that hall and told the speaker to leave the chair, told members of that legislature to quit the floor, and proceeded to organize the Legislature himself by seating a speaker never elected by the Legislature in the chair and by seating members never elected by the people in the place of those whom he drove from the hall.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONAS. For a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. It will be satisfactory to my colleague, I think. It is simply to vindicate history as he passes along. I should like to have my colleague state what the cause of the soldiers coming there was; in other words, at whose bidding and invitation did they come?

Mr. JONAS. The cause of the soldiers coming there, as I say——

Mr. KELLOGG. Did not the democratic speaker ask for them?

Mr. JONAS. It was under an order from the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, the President of the United States, that directed him to install the defeated speaker, directing him to install members who were not elected by the people, and directing him to put the Legislature into power under the Kellogg government. And I say, Mr. President, that "no continent beyond the sea rose" to honor General Grant as the people of this country rose to condemn that act of atrocious usurpation of January, 1875; and among those who were loudest in the denunciation of his acts at that time were two members of the present Cabinet who now advise Mr. Hayes to perpetuate until the incoming of Grant again that arbitrary power by virtue of which he perpetrated this outrage upon the Constitution of the United States and upon the liberties of the people.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to his colleague?

Mr. JONAS. For a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was about to inquire again of my colleague if there was really any order given by any Cabinet minister, by the President of the United States, or by the commanding officer, that any soldiers enter the state-house? On the contrary is it not a fact that the soldiers entered the state-house and the hall of the house of representatives by the request and at the behest of the democratic speaker? Did he not send for them?

Mr. CONKLING. A committee having been sent to ask him.

Mr. KELLOGG. A committee waiting upon Colonel (now General) De Trobriand asking him to detail a file of soldiers to go into the state-house and occupy the hall of the house of representatives at the request of the democratic speaker, or at least the gentleman who claimed to be the democratic speaker, in order to protect him and to preserve order as he claimed?

Mr. JONAS. He detailed some troops for the protection of the Legislature, as I have heard. The speaker thought he had a right to call for them when the Legislature were unable to protect themselves against disorder. They needed troops to protect themselves against the army commanded by the acting governor of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thought the Senator said the troops were to support me and my local authority. I understood that was what the gentleman charged, that the officer interfered with the legislative functions by calling upon the Federal Government to support me and aid the local authorities under my command.

Mr. JONAS. I am giving the history of the outrages perpetrated by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the bayonets under his command. If Speaker Wiltz asked for troops to come within the capitol for any purpose whatever, I think he made a mistake; but I am speaking of the time when General De Trobriand came in and ordered the speaker from his chair and ordered members from their seats, and I say that was done by orders from Washington; that was done by orders of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Louisiana state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONAS. For a question.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator state whether the coming in of those soldiers into that hall was not at the request of the democratic members claiming to be a majority, who sent a committee to General De Trobriand to request him to do so?

Mr. JONAS. To request him to oust their speaker and to oust the members chosen to that body?

Mr. HOAR. I ask whether they did not so come. If it will not disturb the Senator, I should like to ask him another question in regard to the general transaction, which will take about half a minute. Was not the whole transaction exactly this, that the persons who by the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana were authorized to organize that house assembled at the time and place fixed, there being a republican majority in the room; did not a gentleman then get up, one of the democratic members, and move that Mr. So-and-so, a democrat, take the chair, and somebody else say that it was carried when it was not carried and a majority of five or six had voted the other way? Then this gentleman took the chair——

Mr. JONAS. I only yielded for a question.

Mr. HOAR. I am asking if this was not the transaction. Then this gentleman took the chair and proposed somebody for clerk and he was declared chosen when he was not elected, but five or six majority had voted against him, just as if the republicans should do the same thing when the Senate assembled this morning; somebody should move that Mr. EDMUNDS take the chair, and then declare it carried although six or eight majority of democrats had voted against it. That being the condition of things, the democrats being alarmed, themselves sent a committee to General De Trobriand asking him to restore order in that chamber, and General De Trobriand said, "Very well, I will do so, and I will restore order by having all persons except those entitled to organize this house expelled?"

Mr. JONAS. If the gentleman asks a question I will answer it.

Mr. HOAR. Will you answer that question?
